(3) The item relating to section 504 in the table of sections at the beginning of chapter 5 of title 10, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"504. National Guard schools; small arms competitions; athletic competitions.".

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to House Resolution 415, the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. BEREUTER) and a Member opposed each will control 5 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. BEREUTER).

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, this Member rises to offer an amendment which he is jointly presenting with the distinguished gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. LANGEVIN). The Bereuter-Langevin amendment makes a minor change in current law which can reap significant benefits by allowing National Guard units to use already appropriated funds to sponsor competitions and send members to those competitions.

Currently only nonappropriated funds from post exchanges and other activities and from competition entry fees can be used to cover operating expenses for the events of all health, pay, and personal expenses for participating National Guard members. Indeed, the existing National Guard competition events program does provide National Guard members with an opportunity to hone their training-related skills such as running, swimming, and marksmanship in a competitive atmosphere. As the National Guard actively recruits new members, this can be another attractive feature in recruitment and retention programs for certain members of the National Guard.

Through these competitions, National Guard members can qualify for higher level national and international competitions, including the Pan American games and the Olympics. Also, National Guard members who compete in athletic and small arms competitions can now do so with members of the active duty military. Bringing active reserve and National Guard components together in this fashion builds better appreciation among the various components and overall force cohesiveness.

Additionally, some of the National Guard-sponsored competitions are open to participation by the entire civilian community for participation. The high visibility and the community interaction such events provide is key for providing support for local National Guard units.

While recruitment and retention and community support have always been important in maintaining the National Guard structure, they have become even more critical as we wage the war on terrorism during which our men and women in the National Guard are more frequently called to duty overseas and to provide security in our homeland. For the National Guard competitive events programs to continue to thrive, greater funding flexibility, which this amendment provides, must be granted to the National Guard units sponsoring competition and sending members to those competitions.

Now, unlike active duty military personnel who have all health, pay and personal expenses covered while competing, National Guard members are not on duty while competing and, thus, are not covered. For example, if National Guard members suffer injuries while competing at the National Marksman Competition in Little Rock, Arkansas, they must pay for the incurred health care costs, even though they were competing with their National Guard unit.

Unfortunately, placing National Guard members on orders, as occurs with military reservists participating in these competitions, is not a solution to the coverage issue. Why? Because National Guard members placed on active duty cannot compete with their National Guard units team.

Mr. Chairman, it should be emphasized that the amendment does not create participation incentives for the National Guard members which are greater than those incentives for active duty military personnel, nor does it allow the National Guard to seek excessive funds for these activities. Indeed, the amendment limits the National Guard's use of appropriated funds for athletic and small arms competition to a very modest $2.5 million annually.

Mr. Chairman, this Member urges his colleagues to vote for this amendment as an important way not only to recruit or retain motivated men and women for the National Guard, but also to show support for the men and women currently serving our country in our National Guard during this challenging time. I ask for Members' support.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to the amendment. I do not believe there is any opposition. I would like to claim the customary division of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. SNYDER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by my fine colleague, the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. BEREUTER). The amendment he offers would allow the National Guard to use appropriated funds to attend and compete in athletic events and small arms competition. I think it is a good amendment.

The problem we are having here today is there are many fine Members, like the gentleman from Nebraska, who also had ideas they would like to have presented to the House. Not all ideas are ones I would have agreed with. I did not support and will not support the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. TAYLOR) on base closure. I think we do need another round of base closures. I think the process we arrived at last year was a legitimate one.

But people should have their day in the sun to discuss these things, and the voters that sent these Members here should have their day to see these Members bring forth the ideas that they want to have discussed.

I think this is a very sad day for this House, at a time of international conflict, when the world depends on this country to fight the war on terrorism, that good people on the Democratic side were denied amendments to try to improve the bill that provides for the common defense of this country.

I do not think this is the kind of activity and arrogance that the American people are going to tolerate. I hope the lesson learned here through the day and through the night is that we have got to do a better job of acting in the spirit of bipartisanship and not just using it in our press releases back home.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I wanted to explain to my colleagues, in asking for their support, that I am going to be asking for a record vote, only because the gentleman from Rhode Island and I offered this same amendment last year and it was dropped in conference, I assume by our colleagues in the other body. So that is the reason I will be having a record vote. I thank my colleagues for their support.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. TAYLOR of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SKELTON. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. TAYLOR of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentleman from Missouri for yielding to me and giving me this opportunity.

For about 12 hours now I have asked my colleagues, who were all elected by roughly the same number of people as I have been, for an opportunity for an up-or-down vote on whether or not we ought to have another round of base closures.

I am adamantly opposed to base closures. After the first three rounds of base closure, we cannot name one weapons system that has been purchased with base closure money. We cannot find one general, one admiral, one Secretary of Defense, one undersecretary, who would name one base that they think ought to be closed. Yet my colleagues, particularly on the Republican side, have steadfastly refused even the simple courtesy of an up-or-down vote.

Last year the Senate, by the narrowest of margins, passed base closure language. The House never voted on it. It was part of the defense authorization bill which was brought to this House in the conference report well after September 11, when we were given the opportunity to say we are for the troops or against base closure. That really was not a fair fight, and they knew it was not.

Base closure ruins the lives of those military retirees, and over half of them, over half of them have retired near a base so they can use the commissaries and the hospitals. When we close the base, the commissary goes, the hospital goes; and we basically have ruined their lives. They are too old to move again.

Base closure puts every single employee in the Department of Defense wondering, starting tomorrow, whether or not his job is in jeopardy, whether or not he ought to borrow the money to send his kid to college or buy another car or fix up their house. For all the reasons that Members oppose A-76, they ought to be against base closure.

All I have asked is one simple thing today, because I think it is real fair that the business sections around America, all those cities and counties that we all used to serve in the local government that are spending millions, if not billions, of dollars trying to save those local bases from closure, all we want is an up-or-down vote.

We asked for the opportunity to stand up for our constituents. As a matter of fact, most of us begged for the opportunity to stand up for our constituents: send me to Washington so your voice can be heard loud and clear.

Why is it tonight that they hide behind the Speaker? Why is it tonight that they hide behind these silly rules, nine members of the Committee on Rules who will not give a straight up-or-down vote whether or not they think it makes sense to close bases?

We are in a war. How many times have I heard it tonight? Every one of the service chiefs says they need more people, not fewer. Right now, the military is looking for a base to put the Joint Strike Fighter. They are looking for a base to put the F-18E and F.

There is a base in Florida that has three 8,000-foot runways. It has a fourth runway that is 10,000 feet long. The planes can take off and they go straight out over the Atlantic Ocean. They can make all the noise they want. They can do all the dogfighting they want. God forbid, if something goes wrong and they have to eject, they know they can eject without fear of that plane falling on someone's house or a busload of kids.

That base is called Cecil Field. It is outside Jacksonville, Florida. It was closed by a previous round of base closures, and now the taxpayers of America are going to spend over $1 million to replace it because we gave the property away, just like we gave away the property at Governor's Island, just like we gave away the property at the Presidio, and just like we spent $13 billion, let us remember, a thousand, thousand, thousand, thousand times 13 to clean up the bases that we gave away from the first three rounds of base closure.

If Members think that is a good idea, then have the guts to vote for it. But if Members think it is a bad idea, or if they think those of us who think it is a bad idea, who got elected by just as many people as them, ought to have an up-or-down vote on it, I thought I would ask just once tonight to give us a vote.

That is all I ask. If we lose, I understand the rule of the majority. But I think the Members of this House, when those bases start getting padlocked, ought to have the opportunity to look the citizens who are going to lose their bases, who are going to lose their jobs, I think we ought to have the opportunity to look them in the eye and say, I voted to keep this base open, or I voted to shut it down. But do not hide.

Mr. LANGEVIN. Mr. Chairman, today I join my colleague, Mr. BEREUTER, in offering an amendment that strengthens the athletic skill, unit cohesion and morale of our dedicated service members.

As my colleague has explained, this amendment authorizes the National guard to use its appropriated funds to cover the costs of conducting and participating in athletic events related to military duties or physical fitness requirements.

This is of particular importance to my state, as Rhode Island is home to the Leapfest event.

But the entire country benefits from these National Guard competitions. Through these activities, the National Guard provides our service members with the opportunity to hone their service-related skills in competitive events and provides incentives for its recruitment and retention programs.

However, currently state National Guard units can use only non-appropriated funds to cover operating expenses for the events and related personal expenses for participating unit members. These non-appropriated funds are extremely limited, leaving most National Guard members paying out of their own pockets.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to place our Nation Guard members on a level playing field with their Active Duty and Reserves counterparts. I'd like to thank Mr. Bereuter for his leadership on this issue and ask members to vote yes on the Bereuter-Langevin Amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. BEREUTER).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to clause 6 of rule XVIII, further proceedings on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. BEREUTER) will be postponed.

It is now in order to consider amendment No. 15 printed in part A of House Report 107–450.

MOTION TO RISE OFFERED BY MR. TAYLOR OF MISSISSIPPI

Mr. TAYLOR of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion to rise offered by the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. TAYLOR).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. TAYLOR of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 168, noes 241, not voting 25, as follows:

So the motion to rise was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The CHAIRMAN. It is now in order to consider amendment No. 21 printed in part B of House Report 107–450.

PART B AMENDMENT NO. 21 OFFERED BY MR. SMITH OF NEW JERSEY

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will designate the amendment.

The text of the amendment is as follows:

At the end of title VII (page 159, after line 14), insert the following new subtitle:

Subtitle C—Department of Defense-Department of Veterans Affairs Health Resources Sharing

SEC. 721. SHORT TITLE.

This subtitle may be cited as the "Department of Defense-Department of Veterans Affairs Health Resources Sharing and Performance Improvement Act of 2002".

SEC. 722. FINDINGS AND SENSE OF CONGRESS CONCERNING STATUS OF HEALTH RESOURCES SHARING BETWEEN THE DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS AND THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE.

(a) FINDINGS.—Congress makes the following findings:

(1) Federal health care resources are scarce and thus should be effectively and efficiently used.

(2) In 1982, Congress, in Public Law 97–174, authorized the sharing of health resources between Department of Defense medical treatment facilities and Department of Veterans Affairs health care facilities in order to allow more effective and efficient use of those health resources.

(3) Health care beneficiaries of the Departments of Defense and Veterans Affairs, whether active servicemembers, veterans, retirees, or family members of active or retired servicemembers, should have full access to the health care and services that Congress has authorized for them.

(4) The Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of Veterans Affairs, and the appropriate officials of each of the Departments of Defense and Veterans Affairs with responsibilities related to health care, have not taken full advantage of the opportunities provided by law to make their respective health resources available to health care beneficiaries of the other Department in order to provide improved health care for the whole number of beneficiaries.

(5) After the many years of support and encouragement from Congress, the Departments have made little progress in health resource sharing and the intended results of the sharing authority have not been achieved.

(b) SENSE OF CONGRESS.—Congress urges the Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of Veterans Affairs—

(1) to commit their respective Departments to significantly improve mutually beneficial sharing and coordination of health care resources and services during peace and war;

(2) to build organizational cultures supportive of improved sharing and coordination of health care resources and services; and

(3) to establish and achieve measurable goals to facilitate increased sharing and coordination of health care resources and services.

(c) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this Act—

(1) to authorize a program to advance mutually beneficial sharing and coordination of health care resources between the two Departments consistent with the longstanding intent of Congress; and

(2) to establish a basis for improved strategic planning by the Department of Defense and Department of Veterans Affairs health systems to ensure that scarce health care resources are used more effectively and efficiently in order to enhance access to high quality health care for their respective beneficiaries.

SEC. 723. REVISED COORDINATION AND SHARING GUIDELINES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—(1) Section 8111 of title 38, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§8111. Sharing of Department of Veterans Affairs and Department of Defense health care resources

"(a) REQUIRED COORDINATION AND SHARING OF HEALTH CARE RESOURCES.—The Secretary of Veterans Affairs and the Secretary of Defense shall enter into agreements and contracts for the mutually beneficial coordination, use, or exchange of use of the health care resources of the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Department of Defense with the goal of improving the access to, and quality and cost effectiveness of, the health care provided by the Veterans Health Administration and the Military Health System to the beneficiaries of both Departments.

"(b) JOINT REQUIREMENTS FOR SECRETARIES OF VETERANS AFFAIRS AND DEFENSE.—To facilitate the mutually beneficial coordination, use, or exchange of use of the health care resources of the two Departments, the two Secretaries shall carry out the following functions:

"(1) Develop and publish a joint strategic vision statement and a joint strategic plan to shape, focus, and prioritize the coordination and sharing efforts among appropriate elements of the two Departments and incorporate the goals and requirements of the joint sharing plan into the strategic and performance plan of each Department under the Government Performance and Results Act.

"(2) Jointly fund the interagency committee provided for under subsection (c).

"(3) Continue to facilitate and improve sharing between individual Department of Veterans Affairs and Department of Defense health care facilities, but giving priority of effort to initiatives (A) that improve sharing and coordination of health resources at the intraregional and nationwide levels, and (B) that improve the ability of both Departments to provide coordinated health care.

"(4) Establish a joint incentive program under subsection (d).

"(c) DOD–VA HEALTH EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.—(1) There is established an interagency committee to be known as the Department of Veterans Affairs-Department of Defense Health Executive Committee (hereinafter in this section referred to as the 'Committee'). The Committee is composed of—

"(A) the Deputy Secretary of the Department of Veterans Affairs and such other officers and employees of the Department of Veterans Affairs as the Secretary of Veterans Affairs may designate; and

"(B) the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness and such other officers and employees of the Department of Defense as the Secretary of Defense may designate.

"(2)(A) During odd-numbered fiscal years, the Deputy Secretary of Veterans Affairs shall chair the Committee. During even-numbered fiscal years, the Under Secretary of Defense shall chair the Committee.

"(B) The Deputy Secretary and the Under Secretary shall determine the size and structure of the Committee, as well as the administrative and procedural guidelines for the operation of the Committee. The two Departments shall share equally the Committee's cost of personnel and administrative support and services. Support for such purposes shall be provided at a level sufficient for the efficient operation of the Committee, including a permanent staff and, as required, other temporary working groups of appropriate departmental staff and outside experts.

"(3) The Committee shall recommend to the Secretaries strategic direction for the joint coordination and sharing efforts between and within the two Departments under this section and shall oversee implementation of those efforts.

"(4) The Committee shall submit to the two Secretaries and to Congress an annual report containing such recommendations as the Committee considers appropriate. The two Secretaries shall implement the Committee's recommendations unless, with respect to any such recommendation, either Secretary formally determines that the recommendation should not be implemented or should be implemented in a modified form. Upon making such a determination, the Secretary making the determination shall submit to Congress notice of the Secretary's determination and the Secretary's rationale for the determination.

"(5) In order to enable the Committee to make recommendations in its annual report under paragraph (4), the Committee shall do the following:

"(A) Review existing policies, procedures, and practices relating to the coordination and sharing of health care resources between the two Departments.

"(B) Identify changes in policies, procedures, and practices that, in the judgment of the Committee, would promote mutually beneficial coordination, use, or exchange of use of the health care resources of the two Departments, with the goal of improving the access to, and quality and cost effectiveness of, the health care provided by the Veterans Health Administration and the Military Health System to the beneficiaries of both Departments.

"(C) Identify and assess further opportunities for the coordination and sharing of health care resources between the Departments that, in the judgment of the Committee, would not adversely affect the range of services, the quality of care, or the established priorities for care provided by either Department.

"(D) Review the plans of both Departments for the acquisition of additional health care resources, especially new facilities and major equipment and technology, in order to assess the potential effect of such plans on further opportunities for the coordination and sharing of health care resources.

"(E) Review the implementation of activities designed to promote the coordination and sharing of health care resources between the Departments. To assist in this effort, the Committee chairman, under procedures jointly developed by the Secretaries of both Departments, may task the Inspectors General of either or both Departments.

"(d) JOINT INCENTIVES PROGRAM.—(1) Pursuant to subsection (b)(4), the two Secretaries shall carry out a program to identify, provide incentives to, implement, fund, and evaluate creative coordination and sharing initiatives at the facility, intraregional and nationwide levels. The program shall be administered by the Committee established in subsection (c), under procedures jointly prescribed by the two Secretaries.

"(2) To facilitate the incentive program, there is established in the Treasury, effective on October 1, 2003, a DOD–VA Health Care Sharing Incentive Fund. Each Secretary shall annually contribute to the fund a minimum of $15,000,000 from the funds appropriated to that Secretary's Department. Such funds shall remain available until expended.

"(3)(A) The implementation and effectiveness of the program under this subsection shall be reviewed annually by the joint Department of Defense-Department of Veterans Affairs Inspector General review team established in section 724(i) of the Department of Defense-Department of Veterans Affairs Health Resources Sharing and Performance Improvement Act of 2002. On completion of the annual review, the review team shall submit a report to the two Secretaries on the results of the review. Such report shall be submitted through the Committee to the Secretaries not later than December 31 of each calendar year. The Secretaries shall forward each report, without change, to the Committees on Armed Services and Veterans' Affairs of the Senate and House of Representatives not later than February 28 of the following year.

"(B) Each such report shall describe activities carried out under the program under this subsection during the preceding fiscal year. Each report shall include at least the following:

"(i) An analysis of the initiatives funded by the Committee, and the funds so expended by such initiatives, from the Health Care Sharing Incentive Fund, including the purposes and effects of those initiatives on improving access to care by beneficiaries, improvements in the quality of care received by those beneficiaries, and efficiencies gained in delivering services to those beneficiaries.

"(ii) Other matters of interest, including recommendations from the review team to make legislative improvements to the program.

"(4) The program under this subsection shall terminate on September 30, 2007.

"(e) GUIDELINES AND POLICIES FOR IMPLEMENTATION OF COORDINATION AND SHARING RECOMMENDATIONS, CONTRACTS, AND AGREEMENTS.—(1) To implement the recommendations made by the Committee under subsection (c)(2), as well as to carry out other health care contracts and agreements for coordination and sharing initiatives as they consider appropriate, the two Secretaries shall jointly issue guidelines and policy directives. Such guidelines and policies shall provide for coordination and sharing that—

"(A) is consistent with the health care responsibilities of the Department of Veterans Affairs under this title and with the health care responsibilities of the Department of Defense under chapter 55 of title 10;

"(B) will not adversely affect the range of services, the quality of care, or the established priorities for care provided by either Department; and

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to House Resolution 415, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. SMITH) and a Member opposed each will control 5 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. SMITH).

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, next year the Department of Defense and Veterans Affairs will spend over $40 billion combined on health care for current or former military personnel and their families. Despite this enormous sum, despite the fact that this year under the leadership of the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. NUSSLE), the discretionary spending, the health care spending will increase just for VA alone by $2.8 billion, there is still not enough to meet the growing demand.

The bipartisan amendment that I offer today on behalf of myself, the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. STUMP), the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCHUGH), the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. MORAN), and the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. EVANS), is designed to provide additional resources to both health care systems by providing sharing agreements between the Department of Defense and the VA.

Mr. Chairman, while statutory authority to allow resource sharing has existed for more than 20 years, as a matter of fact, the legislation was enacted during my first term 21 years ago, the latest figures tell us that the level of sharing between the VA and the DOD remains extremely low, almost a joke, accounting for less than 1 percent of their combined health care budgets.

The Federal Government can and must do more to increase resource sharing whenever and wherever feasible. Our amendment accomplishes that by providing additional incentives and putting additional pressure on both the Department of Defense and the VA to move forward with commonsense, practical steps to increase the level of resource sharing between these two massive health care systems.

Under our amendment, the VA and DOD would establish at least 5 health care resource sharing projects at locations where both have significant medical facilities. These projects would, to the extent feasible, adopt a new management system to look at ways to eliminate differences between the budget, health care provider assignment, and medical inpatient information systems.

The amendment would also establish a permanent joint committee in the Departments of Defense and VA to provide stronger strategic direction and oversight of sharing initiatives and would authorize $30 million over each of the next 3 years to reward sharing innovations.

Mr. Chairman, let me be very clear. This amendment will not in any way compromise the quality or variety of care available to military veterans, military personnel or their families, or the veterans as well. It will expand health care services, because any savings that are achieved will be reinvested locally so that those benefits will accrue at the local level.

Mr. Chairman, I do have a much longer statement, but let me just finally say that this is backed by the Paralyzed Veterans of America, the VFW, American Legion, and the DAV.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the Members will support the amendment, and I herewith submit for the Record letters of support for this amendment from the organizations I referred to earlier:

The American Legion,
Washington, DC, May 8, 2002.
Hon. Christopher H. Smith,
Chairman, Committee on Veterans' Affairs, House of Representatives, Cannon House Office Building, Washington, DC.

Dear Chairman Smith: On behalf of the 2.8 million members of The American Legion, I would like to express our full support for the Department of Defense (DoD)—Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) Health Resources Sharing and Performance Improvement Act of 2002. The initiatives outlined in this bill would improve health care access for veterans and DoD beneficiaries by authorizing the sharing of health resources between DoD medical treatment facilities and VA health care facilities.

The American Legion recognizes the benefits from current sharing agreements between DoD and VA health care facilities and the potential gains from additional efforts. Clearly, there are multiple venues for sharing agreements that will augment services, build on the respective strengths of the participants and improve overall health care for all DoD and VA beneficiaries.

The American Legion has long supported the goal of improving the quality and access of health care through the sharing and coordination of VA–DoD health care resources. This bill is a solid first step toward achieving that goal.

Once again, The American Legion fully supports the DoD–VA Health Resources Sharing and Performance Improvement Act of 2002. The American Legion appreciates your continued leadership in addressing the issues that are important to veterans, members of the Armed Forces, and their families.

Sincerely,

Steve A. Robertson,
Director, National Legislative Commission.

Paralyzed Veterans of America,
Washington, DC, May 9, 2002.
Hon. Christopher H. Smith,
Chairman, House Committee on Veterans' Affairs, Cannon House Office Building, Washington, DC.

Dear Mr. Chairman: On behalf of the members of Paralyzed Veterans of America (PVA) I want to express our support for your amendment to H.R. 4546, the Bob Stump National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2003. The amendment calls for increased direction and incentives to improve sharing of health care resources and services between the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) and Department of Defense (DoD) health care systems.

PVA strongly believes the two departments have much to share in the provision of health care services that can be of mutual benefit to both patient populations. Unfortunately, existing statutory sharing authority has failed to provide the appropriate atmosphere, direction, and incentives to encourage VA and DoD to maximize their cooperation potential. This amendment seeks to correct that shortcoming.

Both departments have distinct patient population and missions. Recognizing that fact, we applaud language in the amendment that stipulates within the gamut of sharing opportunities, both large and small, such activities will not affect the ability of the VA to protect one of its primary missions—the maintenance of its capacity to provide such specialized services as spinal cord injury care for severely disabled veterans. We believe there are many areas where sharing health care resources can improve care and reduce costs in both systems.

Thank you for your continuing care and concern for our nation's veterans.

Sincerely,

Richard B. Fuller,
National Legislative Director.

Disabled American Veterans
Washington, DC, May 9, 2002.
Hon. Christopher H. Smith,
Chairman, House Veterans Affairs Committee, Cannon House Office Building, Washington, DC.

Dear Chairman Smith: The Disabled American Veterans (DAV) appreciates the introduction of your amendment to H.R. 4546, the national Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2003.

The Department of Defense (DoD)-Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) Health Resources Sharing and Performance Improvement Act of 2002 would, in part, require sharing and coordination of VA/DoD health care resources and authorize initiatives to improve access to health care services provided to beneficiaries of both systems. It would also authorize a demonstration project to identify the feasibility and benefits or disadvantages of coordinated management of health care resources of both departments.

We agree that scarce Federal health resources should be used effectively and efficiently in order to enhance access to high quality health care services for active servicemembers, veterans, retirees, and family members of active or retired servicemembers as provided by law. Certainly we have a compelling moral duty to honor our pledges to them, and a responsibility to see that resources are used wisely to achieve this goal. This amendment seeks to ensure that both departments take full advantage of the opportunities authorized by law to provide improved health care for all beneficiaries. We are pleased that language in the amendment maintains the integrity of the special disabilities programs in accordance with section 1706(b) of title 38, United States Code.

We agree that DoD and VA should commit their respective departments to exploring new ways for significantly improving health resources sharing and to building organizational cultures supportive of health resources sharing. This provisions gives strong incentives for increased collaboration between the respective departments and is an initial step forward to achieving this goal.

We sincerely thank you for your introduction of this amendment and continued support to improve health care services for our Nation's veterans.

Sincerely,

Joseph A. Violante,
National Legislative Director

Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States,
Washington, DC, May 9, 2002.
Hon. Christopher H. Smith,
Chairman, House Veterans' Affairs Committee, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

Dear Chairman Smith: On behalf of the 2.7 million members of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States (VFW) and our Ladies Auxiliary, I am pleased to offer our strong support for the amendment you are to offer to H.R. 4546, the FY 2003 National Defense Authorization Act. This bold and far-reaching legislative initiative will promote health resource sharing between the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) and the Department of Defense (DOD). We strongly believe that improved VA–DOD health resource sharing will greatly benefit our veterans, our active duty military and our military retirees.

Despite the repeated attempts of Congress to increase sharing arrangements, very little has actually taken place. The 1999 Congressional Commission on Servicemembers and Veterans Transition Assistance found that VA and DOD shared only $62 million out of a $32 billion healthcare budget. These two agencies have had the authority to enact sharing agreements for over twenty years, yet they have done little. The VFW believes that the provisions of this amendment will serve as a strong incentive for VA and DOD to at last pursue these mutually advantageous agreements.

It is our view that increased health resource sharing will be doubly beneficial. It has the potential to provide an expanded wealth of services to all beneficiaries, all while reducing costs. The Transition Commission noted, for example, that were VA and DOD to better coordinate the purchase of medical products, including pharmaceuticals and supplies, they would realize a savings of almost $2 billion over a five-year period. Further, a May 2000 General Accounting Office report claimed that VA and DOD could realize a gain of up to $300 million per year with improved joint pharmaceutical contracts.

The VFW insists that all cost-savings resulting from improved resource sharing agreements be reinvested back into the Departments' health care systems without any funding offsets. The resulting supplemental revenue will help bring the Departments' respective health care budgets closer to what is actually needed to provide the timely, first-rate health care our active duty servicemembers and veterans so richly deserve. Additionally, the resultant additional dollars will serve as an effective incentive for the Departments to pursue other additional avenues of health care sharing.

Notwithstanding this legislation's manifest benefits, we do have some concerns that we would articulate here. First, we believe that the individuals who head the Health Executive Committee which this legislation creates should have equal authority and the highest possible access to their respective Secretaries. This will help preserve the integrity of their decision-making and mitigate potential institutional interference. We note that under your amendment the senior DOD head will be the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness whereas VA's Deputy Secretary represents that department. We recommend that the DOD head be the Deputy Secretary of Defense.

A second concern is since the findings of this Committee are essentially binding upon the two departments, that they not unduly supplant established and effective planning procedures nor serve as a means to circumvent the will of the Congress and the longstanding oversight capacity of the veterans service community. Great care must be exercised to ensure that the considerable authority invested in this Executive Committee is not misapplied.

Despite this, the VFW strongly supports this bold approach to expanding and, indeed, enforcing the implementation of VA-DOD health care resource sharing agreements. Most importantly, it specifically addresses a key VFW goal that veterans and the active duty military receive the best possible health care in the best possible way. We thank you for introducing this vital measure, and we look forward to working with you to ensure its success.

Sincerely,

ROBERT E. WALLACE,
Executive Director.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Chairman, I am unaware of any opposition to the amendment, and so I rise to claim the customary division of time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. SNYDER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume, and I rise in support of the amendment offered by my friend and colleague, and the chairman of the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. SMITH).

The amendment he offers, Mr. Chairman, would require the Department of Defense and the Department of Veterans Affairs to approve and expand their health care resource sharing efforts. The gentleman is my chairman on the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, and I appreciate him and look forward to working with him on the Committee on Veterans' Affairs and on the Committee on Armed Services for many years to come on this very important issue.

Ironically, we have time this evening to consider debate on these two last amendments which are noncontroversial. While noncontroversial, they are important and ought to be discussed. The two proponents of these amendments deserve their opportunity to discuss them on the House floor at their request. But just as importantly, we should have had the opportunity to discuss the controversial issues in this bill offered by very fine Members of this House, the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. SPRATT), the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. TAYLOR), the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. BLUMENAUER), the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. MALONEY), the gentleman from Maine (Mr. ALLEN), and others. All had issues they wanted to have discussed.

At the full Committee on Armed Services, under the very able chairmanship of the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. STUMP), we had very vigorous and full debate on every issue that members wanted to be discussed, and we voted on every issue on which someone wanted to vote. The result was people were satisfied with the process and the bill came out of committee 57 to one.

Ironically, the issue we have heard most about today, which is the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. TAYLOR) on base closure, could have been avoided if the Committee on Rules had acted properly last year. Now, what do I mean by that? Last year, the gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN) and I had an amendment to provide for a base closure commission. The Committee on Rules did not make that in order. So the folks that want to discuss base closure can now say we have never had a vote on the House floor. We are repeating this process year after year, denying the opportunity to discuss issues.

In 1981, I was working as a doctor in Thailand as part of the Cambodian refugee relief effort. We were living in the town of Aranyaprathet, right on the border, right next to a Thai army base. It was a very volatile border, and there was a lot of military presence. Got up one morning, the army base was emptied out. The Thai Army had gone to Bangkok to overthrow the government, overthrow the democracy and stage a coup. We went out that day to Thai villages where I would provide medical care with the medical team I worked with. We worked with these Thai paraprofessional medical people, and the fellow we were supposed to work with that morning could not perform his work. All he could do was sit and cry, literally cry about the fact that his democracy was overthrown.

Well, I was very proud to be an American that day, very proud of our American democracy. And what I learned that day in Thailand is that democracy has got to be nourished or we lose it. Well, I am very proud of this bill I am going to vote for here probably in about an hour, when we finish this process; but I am not proud of this process.

I think everyone has gathered that this process has been very dissatisfying to many people in the House, and I would hope my colleagues would respect our opinion in the future on other bills this year. At this very critical time in our Nation's history, we, as a body, as the people's House, need to do a better job of nurturing our democracy in this country.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. MORAN), the chairman of the Subcommittee on Health of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. MORAN of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

The amendment before the House tonight is a compromise that I believe will lead to better health care for our veterans and our service men and women, as well as a more efficient use of resources for their care.

Chairman SMITH has been the driving force behind this idea, and I commend him and the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCHUGH) and the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. SNYDER), the chairman and ranking member of the Subcommittee on Military Personnel, for their very cooperative, fair, and objective considerations of the issues and concerns of both the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Department of Defense and both of our committees here in the Congress.

While each Department has traditional and long-standing values and practices in providing health care to separate beneficiary populations, this bill seeks the common interest of both veterans and military personnel and to create partnerships and better coordinations in each institution. This amendment will commit each Department to improving health sharing and coordination of resources and services. It will also prompt the Department of Defense and the Department of Veterans Affairs to take full advantage of all these opportunities to make our health care resources available for all active and retired service men and women.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to adopt this amendment.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, Congress has long supported the sharing of scarce Federal health care resources between the Department of Defense (DoD) and the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA). In fact, Congress vested both Departments with broad authority two decades ago to do just that and has since repeatedly encouraged more effective and efficient use of this sharing authority by DoD and VA.

President Bush noted in the Administration's Fiscal Year 2003 budget submission to Congress that only a negligible portion of the nation's scarce Federal health care resources are actually being shared between the two Departments. While sharing between DoD and VA exists technically, sharing remains the exception, not the rule. Without future legislation there is little reason to believe that VA and DoD will develop a culture that values mutually beneficial sharing. Until this occurs, taxpayer dollars will not be spent as effectively as possible.

I commend the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. SMITH, for his leadership with this amendment. How much of what kind of sharing is possible? It is my hope that the provisions of this amendment will forge thoughtful answers to this question and achieve the goals long sought by Congress.

Particularly noteworthy are the incentives endorsed in this amendment, which are intended to promote innovation and effective, new approaches to achieving the goals of sharing between DoD and VA. I also applaud the joint oversight provisions of this amendment, introducing shared accountability for the effective use of the resources provided in the amendment and shared accountability for assessing and reporting program outcomes. The Smith amendment allows the Secretaries of DoD and VA to terminate programs that are ineffective or demonstrate inefficiencies or a questionable use of scarce resources.

VA adoption of DoD's Pharmacy Data Transaction Service (PDTS) will provide benefits to veterans receiving VA medical care. Although this data system integration will no doubt present VA with some initial challenges, I believe the integration of these two systems has the potential to greatly improve the quality of patient care, eliminate harmful or dangerous drug interactions and bridge the information technology gaps that persist between the two agencies—on at least one front.

Mr. Chairman, I support this amendment and I urge my colleagues to vote for the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. SMITH).

The amendment was agreed to.

SEQUENTIAL VOTES POSTPONED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to clause 6 of rule XVIII, proceedings will now resume on those amendments on which further proceedings were postponed in the following order: Part A amendment No. 7 offered by the gentlewoman from California (Ms. SANCHEZ), part A amendment No. 8 offered by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GOODE), part A amendment No. 9 offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. PAUL), and part B amendment No. 10 offered by the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. BEREUTER).

The Chair will reduce to 5 minutes the time for any electronic vote after the first vote in this series.

PART A AMENDMENT NO. 7 OFFERED BY MS. SANCHEZ

The CHAIRMAN. The pending business is the demand for a recorded vote on the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from California (Ms. SANCHEZ) on which further proceedings were postponed and on which the noes prevailed by voice vote.

The Clerk will redesignate the amendment.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I just want to take this opportunity to thank the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. SKELTON), the ranking member of the Committee on Armed Services, for all of the hard work and the cooperation that he has put into this bill in the last few days. He has been a joy to work with and a very good friend, and one could not ask for a better partner.

The subcommittee chairmen and the ranking members, thanks to them, and a special thanks, Mr. Chairman, to all of the staff people who have been working these last few weeks hour after hour after hour.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

I think all of us need to thank the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. STUMP), the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, because as is his usual custom, he would never say that he put in more hours than anyone, worked harder, and has delivered an excellent and quality product.

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, let me thank the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. STUMP) for his very generous remarks, but I must say that the bill is appropriately named after him. I might also point out that when I first came to the Congress of the United States, the gentleman from Arizona was my very first friend when we came up here in December of 1976.

A lot of good memories in the memory bank about the gentleman from Arizona. He came out to Whiteman Air Force Base in Missouri with me back in the late 1970s and the airmen there had this wooden stump that they called Sergeant Eucalyptus P. Stump, and the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. STUMP) and Eucalyptus P. Stump had their picture taken together.

I might also say one of those great memories was going back to Ford Island with him in 1991, the 50th anniversary of the bombing of Pearl Harbor, and we went over to Ford Island and he showed me where he was back in 1943 during the war. He is a marvelous, marvelous legislator, a great friend, and one of the most decent human beings, and we thank him immensely for his hard work and his generosity.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no further amendments in order, the question is on the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

Accordingly, the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. LATOURETTE) having assumed the chair, Mr. CAMP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 4546) to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 2003 for military activities of the Department of Defense, and for military construction, to prescribe military personnel strengths for fiscal year 2003, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 415, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute adopted by the Committee of the Whole? If not, the question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

MOTION TO RECOMMIT OFFERED BY MR. SPRATT

Mr. SPRATT. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. SPRATT. I am, in its present form, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Spratt moves to recommit the bill H.R. 4546 to the Committee on Armed Services with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment:

At the end of subtitle C of title II (page 49, after line 17), insert the following new section:

SEC. 234. PROHIBITION ON DEVELOPMENT AND DEPLOYMENT OF NUCLEAR-TIPPED BALLISTIC MISSILE INTERCEPTORS.

(a) PROHIBITION ON USE OF FUNDS.—No funds appopriated or otherwise made available to the Department of Defense or the Department of Energy may be obligated or expended to develop or deploy a nuclear-tipped ballistic missile interceptor.

(b) DEFINITION.—In this section:

(1) The term "nuclear-tipped ballistic missile interceptor" means a ballistic missile defense system that employs a nuclear detonation to destroy an incoming missile or reentry vehicle.

(2) The term "develop" includes any activities referred to in section 179(d)(8) of title 10, United States Code, more advanced than feasibility studies.

Mr. SPRATT (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the motion be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. SPRATT) is recognized for 5 minutes in support of his motion to recommit.

Mr. SPRATT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, when Ronald Reagan launched the Strategic Defense Initiative, he made a wise decision. He decided that SDI should be non-nuclear, and he did it for good reason. SDI was not the genesis of missile defense. President Johnson had proposed a missile defense system in 1967, a system he called the Sentinel. It was to be deployed at 15 sites around the country, but it packed a nuclear warhead, and the news of its coming was not warmly welcomed.

When the Nixon administration came to office, it answered the local resistance to the Sentinel by naming it the Safeguard and by reorienting its mission. Safeguard consisted of 2 interceptors: Spartan, a third-stage missile with a 1 megaton warhead, and Sprint, a shorter range missile with a warhead that produced an intense burst of neutrons. Both of them were radar-guided. Neither was accurate enough for what we call today hit-to-kill, but with a 1-megaton warhead, the Spartan did not need hit-to-kill. The lethal range for the x-rays generated by its warhead above the atmosphere was several kilometers.

These systems were flight-tested often, and compiled an unimpressive record, but there was one flaw that really did it in. A nuclear weapon detonation above the atmosphere produces a huge quantity of electrons. Their interaction creates electromagnetic pulse and ionizes the whole top of the atmosphere. And when electrons in this mix reach a certain density, the waves that are projected by long-range radars are weakened to the point that they can no longer see objects as small as reentry vehicles. In other words, the Spartan and the Sprint, put together, were self-blinding. They did not work. They were self-defeating.

In October 1975, we opened the site at Grand Forks for the deployment of the system and it lasted all of 2 months; 2 months. We spent $20 billion in today's money and the system was shut down.

Now, after spending $20 billion to learn that nuclear-tipped interceptors are self-blinding, self-defeating, let us do not go down that path again. After spending another $60 billion since SDI to perfect the technology we today call hit-to-kill, let us stick to our knitting. It is about to work. It is about to come to fruition. Let us keep missile defense focused on things that are feasible.

Now, my colleagues may say that what I am doing in this motion is setting up a straw man and then knocking him down; that MDA is not even developing so-called nuclear-tipped interceptors, and that is true, for now.

But there are reports that Secretary of Defense Rumsfeld asked the Defense Science Board to weigh this option, and here is what our own committee report says at page 230, in this bill on page 230:

"The committee understands that the Department may investigate other options for ballistic missile defense; among them, nuclear armed interceptors. The committee would consider the examination of such an alternative to be a prudent step." I do not consider that to be prudent in terms of dollars or defense policy. That is why I move to recommit and undo this language.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute and 50 seconds to the gentleman from Maine (Mr. ALLEN).

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I urge support for this motion to recommit to prohibit the development or deployment of nuclear-tipped ballistic missile interceptors.

As the gentleman from South Carolina has said, the Safeguard nuclear antimissile system was canceled by Congress 2 months after it was deployed in 1975, partly because the new Russian MERVs would easily evade the defense and partly because the public would not tolerate U.S.-nuclear explosions over our cities and territories as a way of defending this country.

President Reagan's Strategic Defense Initiative rejected the nuclear option. If President Reagan knew it was a bad idea 20 years ago, why revive it now? Yet Secretary of Defense Rumsfeld has reportedly instructed the Defense Science Board to explore this option. There are bad ideas and there are really bad ideas, and this bill should slam the door on really bad, half-baked ideas like nuclear-tipped ballistic missile interceptors.

General Kadish, director of the Missile Defense Agency, has said that he has no interest in developing nuclear-tipped interceptors. He knows that Americans will never tolerate this sort of defense that relies on U.S. nuclear explosions over our homes, raining down radioactivity and blinding radars and other sensors of conventional missile defenses.

The Committee on Armed Services has held numerous hearings supporting hit-to-kill technology and showing it works. If it works, why return to nuclear explosions as a way of defending our country?

The other side will suggest that we should not restrict the Pentagon's ability to experiment with any technology; but, Mr. Speaker, if that is true, why are we even here? Why do we not write a blank check at the beginning of the year and go home? Because Congress has a constitutional duty to set spending priorities. We should reject this type of missile defense and vote for the motion to recommit.

Mr. SPRATT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the balance of my time.

Mr. Speaker, let us vote to affirm Ronald Reagan's wisdom. Let us win one for the Gipper. Vote "aye" for non-nuclear missile defense.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LATOURETTE). The gentleman from California (Mr. HUNTER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, there is no plan, no funding, no blueprint to use nuclear-tipped interceptors. In fact, we do not have them. We used to, and we disassembled them.

But the Soviet Union, now Russia, does indeed have them; and we are doing precisely, if we vote for this motion to recommit, precisely what the Gipper did not want us to do, and that is for Congress to take all the chips off the table when the President has an opportunity to maybe negotiate down or negotiate out that nuclear-tipped Galosh force that Russia maintains around Moscow right now.

So let us win one for the Gipper; let us not vote for this motion to recommit.

Let me just say one other thing to my Democrat friends. I was all set for a motion to recommit on base closing. What happened to that motion to recommit? I thought that would be what they would offer up here.

I would recommend to us that we kind of keep our eye on the ball. The ball is, we are providing in this bill for the Armed Forces of the United States of America. This bill has been the product of literally thousands of hours put in by Members on both sides of the aisle, by the staff.

I do not know how the rest of the Members feel, but the last 8 months, I have felt a little bit like it must have been after Pearl Harbor. We were hit by a sneak attack in this country. It killed thousands of our citizens. We came together, and a wave of patriotism and spirit moved across this country.

We stood behind our military people. We sent our uniformed forces out to hunt down the enemy and engage them in combat. They have been doing that very, very effectively. I think it is entirely appropriate that we name this bill in honor of the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. STUMP), because he is one of those World War II veterans who joined at the age of 16.

The gentleman from California (Mr. ROHRABACHER) mentioned to me that it might be a good time to mention the other World War II veterans, because we do not have a lot of them. They are a great asset to this Congress.

I would just ask, if they are here tonight, if they can stand: the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL), the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. HYDE), the gentleman from New York (Mr. GILMAN), the gentleman from Texas (Mr. HALL), the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. REGULA), and the gentleman from New York (Mr. HOUGHTON).

If we have missed anyone, please stand up. Let us give them a round of applause. And the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. BALLENGER).

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have come together. We have put in thousands of hours with staff and Members. We have put together a great bill that does what we are supposed to do, and that is, we have given the President and our troops the tools that they need to do the job. They are doing their duty, and 1.2 million Americans in uniform across the world are doing their duty to serve this country. Let us do our duty. Let us pass this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUNTER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. THOMAS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, just to make sure that everybody understands what this vote is, a way of looking at it would be to vote yes or no as a referendum on the motion for the committee to rise and those who sponsored it. If Members like the motion to rise, vote yes; if they did not like what happened, vote no.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the motion to recommit.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. SPRATT. Mr. Speaker, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 9 of rule XX, the Chair will reduce to 5 minutes the time for any electronic vote on the question of passage.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Daniel P. Coughlin, offered the following prayer:

Lord God, rich in mercy and strong to save, may springtime in this Nation bear seeds of peace.

Make nature again recover from human sins of the past. Breathe forth a freshness over land and sea that all may be exalted by Your creative hand and ever-redeeming power.

Bring forth in the human family a new respect for life and a commitment to equal justice for the least and the weakest in our midst that violence may cease and an ordinary cycle of goodness and kindness spread from this place around the world.

May nature and human determination be so wedded that science and faith may spiral into new discoveries to enrich this planet with natural and human beauty.

For You, Eternal Father, are our source of life and recovery, now and forever. Amen.

Hon. J. DENNIS HASTERT,
Speaker, U.S. House of Representatives,

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Thank you for appointing me last year to the Congressional-Executive Commission on China, which was established through the leadership of our colleague, Sandy Levin, to promote human rights and rule of law in China.

To make this Commission as effective as possible, a significant commitment of time is needed by each Commissioner. In light of the responsibilities associated with my election as Democratic Whip, I believe that other members of the Democratic Caucus, equally committed to the fight for human rights in China, could better fulfill the role of Commissioner. I am, therefore, respectfully submitting my resignation as a member of the Congressional-Executive Commission on China. It is my understanding that Leader Gephardt is submitting a new recommendation for this position

Thank you for the honor of naming me to the Commission last year. I look forward to working with you to improve human rights around the world.

Sincerely,

NANCY PELOSI,
Democratic Whip.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, and pursuant to section 303(a) of Public Law 106-286, the Chair announces the Speaker's appointment of the following Member of the House to the Congressional-Executive Commission on the People's Republic of China to fill the existing vacancy thereon:

Mr. BROWN, Ohio.

SENATE—Friday, May 10, 2002

(Legislative day of Thursday, May 9, 2002)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable HARRY REID, a Senator from the State of Nevada.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Dr. Lloyd John Ogilvie, offered the following prayer:

Gracious God, as we prepare for this weekend of Mother's Day, we praise You for our own mothers and the love and care we received from them, and for all the mothers of our Nation for the influence they have in shaping the character of children. We would agree with John Ruskin when he said that the history of a nation is not to be read in its battlefields but in its homes. Thank You for mothers who know You and communicate their faith and moral values to their children. Strengthen the mothers of this land now in this time when children are faced with an unprecedented deprecation of integrity, honesty, and character. Help mothers to be the kind of people they long for their children to become. As children grow into young adults, may their mothers be their best friends and confidants in the quest for confident living. Give us all a renewed appreciation for aging mothers who need a special assurance that they did their best and are appreciated. And for those mothers who have graduated to the next stage of eternal life in heaven with You, may they be remembered with grateful bouquets in our minds and hearts.

Dear God, we pause in the work of this Senate to salute the heroines of hope who are our mothers here or in heaven. Through our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The Honorable HARRY REID led the Pledge of Allegiance, as follows:

> I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

There will be no rollcall votes today. Two hours are set aside to debate that nomination Monday evening.

We hope that at 11 o'clock Senators will come and continue work on the trade bill. We have all learned from our constituents and others how important they believe this is, and we hope we can complete this legislation next week.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GREGG. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECENT EVENTS IN ISRAEL

Mr. GREGG. Madam President, I want to speak on a couple of subjects this morning. First is what is happening in Israel.

Obviously, it is good news that at the Church of the Nativity, which is a shrine of significant importance to all of us who are Christian—obviously, it being the birthplace of Christ—that there has been a settlement. This is a step in the right direction. It is something we can take relief in because, clearly, the church itself was in physical risk, as were the people inside and outside of the church. It would have been a terrible tragedy in this conflict between the parties in the Mideast if that shrine had been permanently damaged. So this is good news.

At the same time, of course, we should not overstate it as an event. Clearly, there is much still happening in the Mideast. Israel, in exercising its rights, will probably proceed to take further action to try to find the people who are responsible for the terrible suicide bombing that occurred just a few days ago. There may be a military action in Gaza. At least that is what is being represented. I think we as a culture—our country—have to decide how we are going to deal with this situation.

The President has made it very clear that as a result of the terrorist attacks on our Nation, we intend to track down terrorists wherever they are and we intend to bring them to justice. In addition, if there is a government that supports those terrorists, we intend to treat that government as an enemy and bring it to justice, as we did in Afghanistan. I believe this to be the absolutely appropriate authority. This is the Bush doctrine. This is the guideline that we must follow. We are in a fight, whether we like it or not, for our cultural survival, for our civilization and its survival.

The purpose of our enemy is not to take real estate or take advantage of real estate or take advantage of economic gain, as has been the tradition of war over the centuries. The purpose of our enemy is to simply kill us because we are American. In fact, if you read the books of Osama bin Laden and of Mulla Muhammad Omar, you see this all the time. The quotes simply say they call on their followers to kill Americans because they are Americans, and for no other reason, and to destroy us. That is their goal.

Well, if the Bush doctrine states clearly and appropriately that our purpose is to find terrorists and bring them to justice, and to treat terrorist governments as if they are our enemy and bring those governments down, then we cannot say to Israel that they should not follow that doctrine. Israel is equally under a terrorist attack—in fact, in many ways, more so because they are more threatened because of their physical situation.

As the suicide bombers continue to kill innocent people and cause great personal injury and try to disrupt the Nation of Israel, which is a democracy and which is an ally, we as a nation must support Israel and say: You have the right, as we also believe we have the right, to pursue these terrorists and bring them to justice and pursue governments that support these terrorists and bring them to justice.

It is very clear—I do not think there can be any question about it—that the Palestinian Authority has been a source of support for terrorist activity. We need to support Israel at this time as we would expect our allies and have expected our allies to support us during our difficult time.

It does mean there probably will be further confrontations, but it also means that at least we will be standing for a purpose which is clear and definable and which is true and correct, and that is we will not tolerate terrorism against our country or against our allies.

TRADE

Mr. GREGG. Madam President, last night an agreement was reached on this trade promotion authority, on the trade adjustment language, and the Andean trade agreement, three bills which have been bundled by the majority leader—there is a fourth one, the general tariffs agreement—that we have been trying to work through as a body. Last night, I understand the parties negotiated a comprehensive settlement to these issues involving trade and trade adjustment.

Trade promotion authority is very important legislation. We as a nation, and States such as New Hampshire specifically—and States such as the Presiding Officer's State especially—depend inordinately on our capacity to have free trade with other countries because our States, our culture has its competitive edge not in some material or commodity we produce, such as an agricultural good or oil; our economic advantage in New Hampshire is that we have people who are very bright and produce goods that are on the cutting edge.

Unfortunately, in the international economy, when you are producing cutting-edge goods, there is a tendency of other nations that cannot keep up to block those goods from coming into their country.

It always works to our advantage to open up a country's trade with us because the goods which we produce—which are on the cutting edge, which are the next generation, and always a step ahead of their competition—become available for sale in that country where we have opened barriers.

In New Hampshire, for example, almost 30 percent of the jobs are tied directly to products which are produced and sold overseas. So trade promotion authority—which is basically a vehicle to allow the administration to negotiate trade agreements, almost all of which, I presume, will allow us to enter other markets—trade promotion authority is very important legislation. This Congress has passed it year in and year out—for many years. In fact, I voted for it innumerable times when I was in the House and even had a chance to vote for it in the Senate.

Unfortunately, in the last few years, it has become tied up with other issues, but I do believe there has always been a strong bipartisan consensus to give the President trade promotion authority.

Unfortunately, as I mentioned, we have now attached to trade promotion authority other issues because people realized around here that if there is a train leaving the station and you can put something on it, the odds are you are going to be able to pass it. These are items which might not pass under a freestanding situation. That is unfortunate because trade promotion is so important. It should not be thrown into this type of a bundle. It should be voted on separately. But the majority leader decided to bundle it.

In that bundle he has put some things which I find to have serious problems, specifically the trade adjustment language and the expansion of the entitlements under the trade adjustment language.

There are two major initiatives in this proposal which are going to significantly expand direct costs and burdens on the taxpayers of America and will open the door to policy activity in an arbitrary way, and we cannot see the unintended consequences yet, which I think are going to be significant and extraordinarily expensive.

The trade adjustment bill, which is not involved in negotiating treaties, the purpose of which is to assist people whose jobs have been impacted as a result of trade activity—in other words, if you worked for a textile mill in New Hampshire maybe 20 years ago, and that textile mill was put out of business because of trade activity, because of low-cost cotton goods coming into the country—in fact, it happened even more recently than that. There are a couple companies in the western part of New Hampshire that have gone out of business in recent years as a result of trade activity. If you work for that type of company, under the trade adjustment authority, you would have certain benefits accrued to you in the areas of training and unemployment compensation so you can have an opportunity to get back into the workforce more quickly and be less impacted by that trade activity.

What is being proposed in this bill, however, is a significant expansion to benefit those people—well-intentioned, obviously—who have been dislocated as a result of trade activities, specifically the expansion of health care coverage and a wage supplement should they not take a different job. Let's talk about both of these.

Madam President, the health care benefit means if you lose your job and it is designated a job loss as a result of trade activity, you will be able to get health insurance. Seventy percent of the cost of that will be paid by the Federal Government. You will be out of work, but you will be able to get health insurance. You will have to buy it through a pooling agreement. You will not be able to go out on the market and buy it. You will have to buy it through a pooling agreement, and you will be reimbursed through what is called a refundable tax credit. It is a tax benefit, a payment which amounts to an entitlement payment and really is not tax related at all. You will get this money and be able to buy through this pooling agreement, theoretically at least, health insurance. It might not be the health insurance you want, but you can buy it and get 70-percent support for it.

What is the problem with that? It sounds pretty good. Yes, it is pretty good, obviously. What does it do? It does a couple of things. First, if you are working today in America, you may not have health insurance. You are paying taxes, but you may not have health insurance. There may be a variety of reasons you do not have health insurance.

This bill says a person who is unemployed has a right to have their health insurance underwritten to the extent of 70 percent of its cost, but a person who is employed and may not have health insurance does not get health insurance. That clearly creates a huge inequity in our system.

It is a new concept: If you are unemployed, you have a right to health insurance. But if you are employed and you do not have health insurance, you are out of luck.

The implications of this are that either you are going to start covering everybody because, obviously, you are already covering the unemployed or you are going to leave a large segment of America saying: Hey, I am working for a living; I am paying taxes for a living; I do not have health insurance, but I have to pay extra taxes so that somebody who is not working can have health insurance.

I think that is going to be hard to swallow for people who are working and do not have health insurance.

In addition, the structure and the way the health insurance is going to be purchased make very little sense. The pooling agreements do not exist. In fact, the State that is probably furthest ahead in pooling agreements is New Hampshire, and we do not even have it up and running yet.

The concept that one cannot go out in the marketplace and buy it if they want, that one has to buy it through some sort of structured event which may mean they are going to get insurance they do not need, coverage they do not need, costs they do not need, probably get a lot better deal maybe if they go out and buy it through a different system, the limitation which basically is forcing them to buy it in one specific way versus allowing them to use the marketplace, completely makes no sense. If this is going to be done, which to begin with is to create a major new entitlement, then it ought to at least be done in a way that makes economic sense to the person who is getting the benefit and makes sense to the insurance market so that a healthier insurance market is made rather than a less healthy insurance market.

In this proposal, it will not be positive for health insurance for energizing better coverage. There is a major new entitlement being created under this bill, which is being created in back rooms somewhere, which has never really gone through the light of day of the committee process and which has very little to do with trade—in fact, nothing to do with trade, for that matter—and is opening the door to a huge new issue of how we deliver health care coverage in this country.

As a result, it is setting down a path which we may not be able to get off and which may basically lead to a massive expansion along the lines of what was proposed by President Clinton of the way we address health care in this country, which is essentially a nationalization system. I do not think that is too far fetched a step to take. This is more than just putting your toe in the water as to moving down that road. When we start insuring people who do not have jobs and give them health insurance when there are people who do have jobs who do not have health insurance, it is going to be incredibly expensive. Who pays in the end? Well, the money we use in the Federal Government does not come from the sky. It comes from the wage earner. It comes from people who have to pay taxes.

This is a huge, brandnew entitlement being put together in the middle of the night—this one especially in the middle of the night—which has not been properly vetted and which has significant issues surrounding it.

The second concept in this bill which raises very serious public policy questions is this idea the Federal Government is going to come in and say to somebody who has lost a job as a result of trade activity that if that person goes out and finds a job that does not pay them as much as they had in the job they lost as a result of trade activity, the Federal Government is going to come in and arbitrarily pay a portion of the difference between what that person earned under their job prior to the trade activity and the job after the trade activity.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's 10 minutes have expired.

Mr. GREGG. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for another 5 minutes.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GREGG. I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Missouri.

What is the practical effect? Let's take an example. If someone is working, for example, for a steel company, which is an example that is fairly current considering the discussions, and they were being paid labor union wages at a very high rate—let's say they were making $40,000 a year, maybe more—and they lost their job allegedly because the steel was no longer competitive with the foreign steel that was coming in—there are a lot of factors that may have led to that, including the fact that wage rates were no longer competitive—and then they move out of that job and take another job—let's say they decide, well, I would like to teach; I have done steel for 20 years and I am tired of it; I want to do something else, maybe I want to go into teaching—and they get a teaching job at a private school, say a Catholic school that does not pay too much—it is more of a social service really—and they are getting paid $20,000 to do that, the $20,000 they are not making the Federal Government is going to come in and supplement and say, we are going to pay the difference or a portion of that difference.

Well, that creates all sorts of unintended consequences and adverse selection issues. I can see a lot of people saying, I am going to close my company down, claim the trade caused them to close their company down and they are going to go out and get another job which pays a lot less, which is a job they always wanted to have; they are tired of doing this job, and they will let the Government pay the difference.

The implications of this are absolutely staggering. One does not have to think too long to see what the implications are. And who is paying the cost? Where is this money coming from? The American wage earner, the people still working for a living, working hard, they have to pick up that difference. Essentially we are going to pay people not to be as productive as they were before, because in our society theoretically people are paid based on their productivity. The implications for our economy are significant; the implications for the Federal Treasury are significant; the implications for our taxpayers are significant. It is a public policy initiative of huge import, and maybe we want to do it, but I do not think we want to do it in the middle of the night the way this bill is proceeding.

The trade adjustment language in this bill raises very significant problems, and to hook it to the trade promotion authority raises the question: Is it worth the price of getting trade promotion authority to put in place these types of expansive public policy initiatives which involve huge implications on the expenditure side of our Government? That is a question with which the Senate has to deal.

Obviously, the Senate may be supportive of it, but it is a question with which we have to deal. I think it is a question we should vote on because it is way outside the budget and a point of order is appropriate to these two issues because they are outside the budget. We ought to at least have a supermajority addressing this issue rather than having it passed on a simple majority.

I thank the Chair, and I especially thank the Senator from Missouri for his courtesy.

I yield the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BOND. Madam President, first, I support and second very strongly the comments made by my good friend and colleague from New Hampshire. I am a traditionalist, and I like to see things come out of the committee because, frankly, committee work ensures there is full consideration of all the measures that come to the floor. We have seen leadership rewriting bills—the farm bill, the energy bill, the stimulus bill—and the products are not good.

What my colleague from New Hampshire has described seems to me not only a very expensive, very bad policy direction that has been taken on this trade adjustment assistance, it is beginning to smell to me like an effort to love it to death. I have been around legislative bodies long enough to know if one does not want to stand up and kill something, such as trade promotion, they do not want to come out and say, no, I am not for free trade, the best way to kill it is to put so much stuff on it that it sinks.

This was not done in committee. This was not done in the light of day, as the Senator from New Hampshire said.

This was done behind the scenes. This was an effort to sabotage trade promotion. I hope this body will say no. Frankly, if it were to go to the President with all of this junk on it, I hope he would veto it and send it back.

We need trade promotion authority. We do not need a huge new socialistic program to have the Federal Government paying people's salaries when they are working. Trade adjustment assistance traditionally as we have had it, yes, it makes a lot of sense, but to have a whole new health care program, not going through the committee structure, a whole new income supplement program not fully considered, not aired out, put on this bill, I think is an outrage. I hope it does not take a supermajority to get this—or 41 votes to get it off.

I hope we have an up-or-down vote and the people who are really for trade promotion authority, the people who want to give our farmers the opportunity to produce and sell in the world market will stand up and say no, we need trade promotion authority clean, not with all of these love handles on it.

THE STATE OF SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. BOND. Madam President, I rise to report on the state of small business and share with my colleagues, staff, and our constituents some of the concerns in the small business communities. The President declared this week Small Business Week and we have had small business activities all week talking about wonderful entrepreneurs who are making the economy grow and providing jobs as well as strengthening their communities.

I don't think there is any question that small businesses are the foundation of our economy. They employ over half the private sector workforce. Two-thirds of all new jobs are created by small businesses. They constantly lead the way in innovative and creative solutions to the challenges that face us.

Some very large businesses, obviously, started as small businesses. Others have chosen to remain small. This country's future will be determined by today's small businesses.

With so much at stake, we have adopted the policy in the Committee on Small Business of doing something that was not traditional prior to 1995 when we started going out and listening to the broad range of concerns of small business. I am proud to say on a bipartisan basis the Committee on Small Business over the last 7 years has not only listened to the needs of small business but done a very good job in responding to those needs. As the ranking member of the committee, I can say I have always learned when I have listened to the small businesses in my State and around the country.

There is something now they are discussing that has moved to the top of their concerns, moved to the top of the ladder. Small business concerns used to be regulatory issues, tax issues, bundling issues, availability of the SBA credit assistance. The issue driving small business owners and their employees nuts is the issue of the cost of health care. Small businesses are saying they cannot get the kind of health care for themselves and their employees and families that a large business or a union or a government can provide.

There are about 40 million people in this country without health insurance. We talk about that a lot. This is a serious concern. Madam President, 60 percent of those—24 million—are in the small business family. Of the 40 million without health insurance, 24 million are from small business. They are either workers in small business or members of the family of small business employees. Why? To a large extent in the past we have not given tax deductions for entrepreneurs, small business proprietors who buy health insurance for themselves.

I started that battle in 1995 and by 2003 we finally get 100-percent deductibility. Now the problem is the cost of health insurance. Many individuals who are among the employed but uninsured work for small businesses that would like to provide health insurance but can't because in some instances it is too expensive; in other instances they cannot bargain with and get the kind of benefits they need. They are not talking about lavish benefits.

We are trying to get basic health care for employees, their families, their children, mothers who need prenatal and postnatal care, children getting vaccinations. It does not matter how many mandates are passed regarding what States say to businesses, what they ought to do, health plans saying what they ought to do, or even a Patients' Bill of Rights. One basic right the small businesses don't have is the right to be able to purchase affordable health care.

It seems to me the only solution to help the employed but uninsured is to allow small businesses across the country to pool together and access health insurance through their membership in a bona fide trade or professional organization. This should provide small businesses the same opportunities as other large insurance purchasers. The association health plans, or AHPs, would reduce cost, to spread the costs and risk, increase group bargaining power with large insurance companies, and generate more insurance options for small business.

The principle underpinning AHPs is simple, the same principle that makes it cheaper to buy a soda by the case than in individual cans. Bulk purchasing is why large companies and unions get better rates for employees and small business. It is time we bring the same kind of Fortune 500-style employee health care benefits to the Nation's Main Street small businesses and their employees.

AHPs are not a new idea. They have been talked about, argued about, compromised for almost a decade. During that period, what once was thought to be a manageable problem has become the crisis we have today. A bill has been introduced by my neighbor, my friend from Arkansas, Senator HUTCHINSON, that creates these AHPs. It is the Small Business Health Fairness Act of 2001. I cannot overstate the urgency of moving this legislation. The House has passed a similar bill. The President has strongly come out in support of AHPs. The President does not want small businesses to be health insurance islands under themselves. I agree. We must do this for small businesses, their employees, and their employees' families.

Also, it is important we go ahead and make permanent the tax cuts we provided last year. More than 21 million businesses filed tax returns as individuals. These are nonfarm, sole proprietorships, partnerships and S Corporations. They had receipts of less than $1 million. And 92 percent of all small businesses under $1 million are pass-through entities. The tax rate relief we gave last year means there will be more money to invest in the business, to invest in equipment, and to put more people to work. We need to make it permanent.

We are not talking about rich "fat cats" here. According to 1999 Census data, of the nearly 15 million full-time, self-employed people in 1999, median business earnings were $30,000 and 38 percent of them earned between $30,000 and $75,000.

In addition, the former chief economist for the SBA's Office of Advocacy, testified last March before the Senate Finance Committee that "[e]very dollar of profit or tax relief tends to be reinvested in the [owner's] firm." With more of their tax dollars in hand, these small business owners will be able to reinvest in their businesses—purchase new and more efficient equipment. They will be able to expand their product lines and the services they render. And—most importantly—they will be able to continue creating more jobs in our home towns.

But the tax bill did not stop at just cutting tax rates. It also dramatically changed the death tax, putting it on the road to extinction by 2010. Too often we have heard about the family-owned company that has had to be sold just to pay the death taxes. According to the SBA, more than 70 percent of all family businesses do not survive through the second generation and fully 87 percent do not make it to a third generation. That's an absurd result of the tax code.

But we are forgetting an even greater problem caused by the estate tax.

Thousands of small businesses in this country waste millions of dollars each year on estate planning and insurance costs just to keep the doors open if the owner should die.

To put this into perspective, a survey of family owned businesses in Upstate New York revealed that average spending for tax planning, attorney and consultant fees, life insurance premiums, internal labor costs, etc., was nearly $125,000 per company over a 5 year period. That's even before any Federal estate taxes are counted.

Just think what could be done with that kind of money in a small business if it didn't have to be paid to accountants, lawyers, and insurance companies. It could be used to create more jobs in our communities. In short, the estate tax can spell the end of a small business, but it is also a jobs killer in this country.

With all of its strengths, however, the tax bill has one major flaw—procedural rules in the Senate forced it to be limited to a ten-year life. So, while America's entrepreneurs can enjoy the benefits of the tax bill today and over the next several years, our work is not finished. We must make the tax cuts, and in particular the repeal of the estate tax, permanent. Otherwise, our success in reducing the tax burden will turn into the largest tax increase in American history come 2011. That's a result I will strongly oppose and hope never to see.

Of course, another of the primary issues that come to me is how to create more small businesses. Money and good management skills are keys to starting and running a successful small business. The federal government has demonstrated that it is capable of delivering help in both areas to small businesses through the Small Business Administration. Each year, over one million small business people and entrepreneurs receive help from the SBA's core management assistance programs: the Small Business Development Centers, SCORE, and the Women Business Centers.

At the same time, SBA has demonstrated an ability to make loans and venture capital available to 40,000–50,000 small businesses annually. While the number of small businesses has exploded over the past decade, the SBA credit programs have not been able to keep pace with the demand. As many of my colleagues in the Senate know, SBA's credit programs are not designed to compete with the private sector; rather, they are supposed to meet the demand from small businesses that cannot otherwise obtain a regular commercial loan or investment capital.

This demand is great; unfortunately, these programs are not meeting the growing small business demand, particularly from women-owned small businesses, which is the fastest growing small business segment. Much of the blame can be placed on career bureaucrats in the Office of Management and Budget who use unrealistically high default estimates to drive up the cost of the SBA's flagship 7(a) guaranteed business loan program. Just for next year, OMB's estimates are adding an unnecessary $100 million in appropriations to the cost to run the program. Since 1992, OMB's estimates have caused the borrowers and lender to pay about $1.4 billion in excess fees. The excess fees and the pressure for higher appropriations have placed unnecessary and counterproductive limits on the growth of the 7(a) loan program.

The other SBA credit programs have also experienced similar problems. The 504 Development Company Loan Program has paid excessive fees totaling over $400 million, and the Small Business Investment Company Program has paid in $500 million over the amount needed to run that program.

To begin to correct this problem, last December Congress enacted S. 1196, which included key provisions lowering the fees from the 7(a) and 504 loan programs. These changes will go into effect on October 1, 2002.

Last fall, I introduced the Small Business Leads to Economic Recovery Act of 2001, S. 1493, which is designed to provide effective economic stimulus to small businesses in three distinct but complementary ways: increasing access to capital for the Nation's small enterprises; providing tax relief and investment incentives for our small firms and the self-employed; and directing one of the Nation's largest consumers—the Federal government—to shop with small business in America.

Subsequently, Senator KERRY and I introduced S. 1499, which adopts the access to capital provisions from S. 1493. This bill is a bipartisan collaboration to devise one-time modifications to the 7(a) and 504 Loan Programs because the traditional approach to disaster relief will not address the critical needs of thousands of small businesses located at or around the World Trade Center, the Pentagon and in strategic locations throughout the United States. S. 1499 has passed the Senate and is waiting for action in the House of Representatives. In the near future, I am hopeful we can add this important bill to another must-pass bill so that it can be on the President's desk for his approval.

The SBA has undertaken the first creative steps to reach more small business borrowers. I applaud their efforts and encourage the SBA management team led by Administrator Hector Barreto to do more. It is estimated there are as many as 25 million small businesses in the United States. Our Federal credit programs need to be able to reach many more small commercial borrowers. When I hear from women's business owners that they cannot obtain loans or investment capital, I want to know why the SBA programs are not serving this fast-growing segment of our Nation's business community. When minority entrepreneurs cannot obtain credit, I want to know what SBA is doing to correct this problem.

As the ranking member of the Committee on Small Business and Entrepreneurship, I am in a position to take the battle to the OMB. But it is up to the SBA to work with our Nation's lenders and venture capitalists to find ways to expand existing programs and to create new ways to deliver credit assistance to help fuel the engine that drives the economy of the United States—the small business community.

One thing that can sap the strength of that engine is the burden imposed on small businesses by regulations. The SBA Office of Advocacy has estimated that regulations cost businesses with less than 20 employees almost $7000 per employee per year. This is nearly 60 percent higher than businesses with over 500 employees.

Six years ago, Congress, without dissent in the Senate, took an historic step towards reigning in the federal government's regulatory machine and protecting the interests of small businesses. My Red Tape Reduction Act, what others call the Small Business Regulatory Enforcement Fairness Act, ensured that small businesses would be given a voice in the regulatory process at the time when it could make the most difference: before the regulation is published as a proposal.

Without question, the Red Tape Reduction Act has yielded some remarkable results and provided small businesses with a greater voice and opportunity to have an impact in the rulemakings which threaten to do them the most harm. Perhaps the best known provision is the requirement that OSHA and EPA convene panels to receive comments from small businesses before their regulations are proposed. This gives these agencies the unique opportunity to learn up front what the problems with their regulation may be, and to correct these problems when it will cause the least difficulty. This has resulted in significant changes being made, and in one case, EPA abandoning a regulation because they recognized that the industry could deal with the issue more effectively on their own.

Experience with this panel process has proven to be an unequivocal success. The former Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration Jere Glover has stated that, "Unquestionably, the SBREFA panel process has had a very salutary impact on the regulatory deliberations of OSHA and EPA, resulting in major changes to draft regulations. What is important to note is that these changes were accomplished without sacrificing the agencies public policy objectives."

Unfortunately, however, there are still examples where agencies have not provided small businesses with the appropriate opportunity to participate, and have flouted the requirements of SBREFA through abusing the flexibility Congress provided to the agencies to determine how and when they would comply. It has become clear that these are more than mere isolated incidents and that the Red Tape Reduction Act itself needs to be amended to achieve the goal Congress had in mind when passing the original Regulatory Flexibility Act, and the subsequent Red Tape Reduction Act.

This is why I introduced The Agency Accountability Act, S. 849 during last year's Small Business Week. This bill would further amend the Regulatory Flexibility Act and close some of the loopholes that agencies have exploited in their desire to pursue their regulatory agendas on the backs of small businesses by doing the following:

It requires the agency to publish a summary of their economic analysis supporting the decision not to certify a regulation as not having "a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities," and to make the full economic analysis available to the public so that interested parties will be able to evaluate whether the agency has met their burden to do adequate outreach and analysis in determining the impact of the regulation.

It allows small entities to seek judicial review of this certification decision if they believe that the agency has not supported it with adequate data and analysis.

It directs the Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration to promulgate a regulation to define further the terms of "significant economic impact" and "substantial number of small entities" so that agencies can no longer define these terms themselves and claim that they were within the bounds of the law when their definitions allow them to avoid the requirements of SBREFA and the Regulatory Flexibility Act.

Finally, it adds the Internal Revenue Service, the U.S. Forest Service, the National Marine Fisheries Service, and the Fish and Wildlife Service to the list of agencies that must conduct small business review panels before they can issue proposed regulations.

Another area the agencies have failed at miserably is to supply the compliance assistance that is required by the Red Tape Reduction Act. GAO has issued a report that clearly indicates how agencies have ignored this requirement or made a complete botch of it when they have attempted to meet it. I will be introducing legislation to address this problem soon.

My views are simple. I want an agency that intends to regulate how a business must conduct its affairs to do so carefully and only after it has taken every step to insure that it will impose on that small business the least amount of burden to achieve its stated objective. Once they do issue a regulation, they have an obligation to be able to explain what small businesses must do to comply with it. This is not about blocking agencies from promulgating regulations, it is about making sure they produce the best regulations possible with the least unnecessary burden on small businesses.

Six years ago, the Senate said in a unanimous voice that it wanted agencies to treat small businesses fairly. That commitment to protecting this most vulnerable segment of our economy, at a time when the Federal government can literally determine if a business will survive as a result of the regulatory burden imposed on it, is still alive. It is time that we ensured agencies are accountable for their actions by enacting the Agency Accountability Act.

On the positive side, the Federal Government can be and should be a reliable and committed purchaser of goods and services from small businesses. The Small Business Act says that small firms shall have the maximum practicable opportunity to compete for Federal contracts. This is good for small business, good for the purchasing agencies, and good for the taxpayer who pays the bills because when small business competes for contracts this lowers the prices and raises the quality.

Small business benefits from having access to a stable revenue stream while they get up-and-running. The Small Business Act recognizes how government contracting can contribute to business development and economic renewal. For example, my HUBZone program provides contracting incentives for small firms to locate in blighted neighborhoods, helping them win Federal contracts and stabilize their revenues while they develop a nongovernmental customer base.

The State of Small Business, on this front, is mixed. We finally succeeded in restoring funding for the HUBZone program, as SBA finally sent up a reprogramming request that the Appropriations Committee found acceptable. The mishap that occurred last year, of defunding the HUBZone program, has now been corrected.

Moreover, SBA is on the verge of removing the biggest of the roadblocks currently holding the HUBZone program back. Contrary to express Congressional direction, the previous Administration had put the HUBZone and 8(a) contracting programs in competition with each other, by trying to give an automatic preference to 8(a) in all cases. We at the Small Business Committee had sought to avoid pitting these programs against each other, by mandating parity between the programs. Contracting officers would be equally obligated to carry out both programs.

SBA disregarded the congressional will on this point, and contracting officers found the regulations confusing. SBA's noncompliance hurt both programs, because contracting officers did not know what to do.

In January, SBA published proposed rules to correct this situation and to establish the parity that Congress intended. I am confident we are about to enter a new era in which the HUBZone program will finally live up to its potential.

And not a moment too soon, either. This program will direct contracting dollars into the most chronically distressed areas of the nation. People who live in these areas, without jobs and often without hope, need the opportunities that the HUBZone program will provide. Finally, we are going to get serious about getting help to these folks who need it so desperately.

Unfortunately, Federal government's performance in contracting with women-owned small businesses is less encouraging. Since 1994, when Congress enacted a goal of 5 percent of contract dollars for women-owned firms, the Government has consistently fallen short. We have never met that goal. We have never come close.

Last year, I received a report from the General Accounting Office on contracting participation by women-owned firms. The clear message was this: if the Government is to meet the 5 percent goal, the Department of Defense must meet its own 5 percent goal. DOD is the 800-pound gorilla in Federal procurement. Sixty-four percent of Federal contracting dollars come from the Pentagon. Without a full DOD commitment to the women-owned business goal, the rest of the Government does not handle enough contracting dollars to make up the shortfall.

Similarly, DOD frequently uses the practice of bundling small contracts together so that small businesses are unable to bid on the work. In the words of President Bush "Bundling effectively excludes small businesses." He understands this hurts small business and has asked OMB to look for ways to avoid this approach and for opportunities to break up bundled contracts to permit more participation by small business. I welcome the President's support in this cause.

This week Senator KERRY and I offered a bill that would close loopholes in the definition. I appreciated working with him to develop this important measure. Increasingly, it looks like we are getting close to a meeting of the minds on this issue, and I am hopeful we can at long last do something serious to control contract bundling and ensure that the Federal government's contracting practices allow for the maximum possible participation by small business.

Never has our country needed or relied upon small businesses as much as now in the wake of the devastating attacks of September 11. Yesterday, my colleague Senator KERRY and I introduced a resolution, S. Res. 264, expressing the sense of the Senate that small business participation is vital to the defense and security of our Nation. On September 11, 2001, the people of the United States were subject to the worst terrorist attack in American history. Our nation's response has been truly astounding. And it should come as no surprise that small businesses are playing a vital role in that response.

Small businesses have the unique ability to respond quickly and precisely, to emerging needs and conditions. Many of the most innovative solutions to our problems such as new technologies for defense readiness come from small firms. In fact, in October 2001, the Pentagon's technical support working group sent out an urgent plea, seeking ideas and technology to assist the military fight terrorism. In just two months, legions of small businesses responded to the Pentagon's call. Over 12,500 ideas poured into the Pentagon, most of them from small businesses. This remarkable response once again shows that small business remain the most innovative sector of the United States economy, accounting for the vast majority of new product ideas and technological innovations.

Just last week I had the opportunity to acknowledge the volunteer efforts of three Missouri companies that are helping re-build over an acre-long section of the Pentagon's roof, which was damaged badly in the September 11 terrorist attacks.

Frederic Roofing and Sheet Metal Company of St. Louis, Performance Roof Systems of Kansas City, and Watkins Roofing of Columbia, are participating in a massive effort to help repair part of the damage sustained by the Pentagon. These Missouri companies are independent, small businesses, modern-day Davids ready and willing to take on part of a Goliath-sized project. They have joined with roofing contractors from across country and the National Roofing Contractors Association to raise in excess of $500,000 worth of cash, materials, and labor toward this project. Their work reflects the enterprising spirit that makes small businesses such a potent force in our economy. They deserve our admiration for rolling up their sleeves and pitching in to help restore the Pentagon.

To help raise awareness of small business innovation in the homeland defense area, on July 10, 2002, Senator KERRY and I will co-host an expo on Capitol Hill to showcase small businesses and their homeland security products. The Small Business Homeland Security Expo will provide an opportunity for small business owners to educate us here in Washington about their latest innovative products, technology, and research. I am excited to bring these hardworking entrepreneurs here to show us just how valuable their contributions are to our Nation's security and defense. These small businesses are a cross-section of America—they are women-owned, minority-owned, and often represent economically disadvantaged areas.

Numerous small businesses have lined up to showcase their exciting products and services for homeland defense and the fight against terrorism. We intend to highlight these businesses at the Expo and in the accompanying book being prepared for the event. The work of small businesses toward this goal is a product of the same volunteer spirit that helped save lives, combat unthinkable disaster, and restore the nation's hope after the darkest hours of September 11.

Madam President, I am happy to report to the Senate that the small business sector of our economy is thriving even though the challenges they face are stiff and numerous. The determination to be successful is a hallmark of small businesses as it has been the foundation of our nation throughout the years. Small businesses are at the forefront of new advances in technology, health care, environmental management, and virtually every industry possible. I have no doubt that small businesses will continue to lead the way.

The big question I have is whether we will be able to help them. Small business wants the Federal government to be a friend, not an adversary. They want us to be their customer and advisor, not a competitor or intruder. In every action we take, we must always ask what the impact on small businesses will be, and make every effort to refrain from that action if we do not believe it will have a beneficial impact. The future of our country is tied to the future of small business and by enhancing the conditions that support small business, we will ensure a more prosperous future for all.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

ANDEAN TRADE PREFERENCE EXPANSION ACT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume consideration of H.R. 3009, which the clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

> A bill (H.R. 3009) to extend the Andean Trade Preference Act, to grant additional trade benefits under that Act, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I am very proud to be able to stand in this Chamber today and say that we have reached a compromise on fast track, trade adjustment assistance, Andean trade, and the Generalized System of Preferences, or GSP.

Last night, my good friend and colleague, Senator GRASSLEY and I—along with the administration—were able to reach an agreement that I believe will gain very broad bipartisan support.

As I have said before, this bill, if passed, will be the first major rewrite of international trade legislation in 14 years. It is an historic opportunity for all of us.

Last week, I outlined the need for fast track and for renewing and expanding the Andean Trade Preference Act. Those bills are identical to the bills offered last week.

Let me outline today the compromise that was reached on trade adjustment assistance.

I believe that the TAA legislation will be one of the most important bills to be adopted by the Senate this year. Importantly, this bill makes several changes to the TAAA program to make it more effective.

First, it extends the period for which TAA pays out income support from 52 to 78 weeks. This allows TAA recipients to stay in the program long enough to complete training for new jobs.

Second, we expand eligibility for TAA benefits to secondary workers. For example, if an automobile producer is affected by imports, displaced workers in supplier companies—tire and windshield manufacturers, for example—will also be covered. We expect that approximately 65,000 additional workers will be eligible for TAA because of this provision.

Third, we agreed to extend TAA benefits when a U.S. manufacturing plant moves offshore to any country. In addition, we have codified the provisions covering downstream workers who are currently covered by the NAFTA transitional program.

Fourth, we expand TAA benefits. This legislation authorizes $300 million for training—nearly tripling the program.

The legislation also helps TAA recipients obtain healthcare insurance. Displaced workers will be eligible for an advanceable, refundable tax credit of 70 percent.

That money can be used for COBRA or for the purchase of certain State-based group coverage options. We also provide interim assistance through the National Emergency Grant program.

In my opinion, this is most significant bipartisan agreement on health care in many, many years.

Fifth, this legislation provides a special TAA program for family farmers, ranchers, and fishermen.

And finally, this bill creates a pilot program on wage insurance—a concept that has been endorsed by former USTR Carla Hills and Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan.

In addition to agreeing on a much improved and expanded TAA program, we have also agreed to extend the Generalized System of Preferences through the end of 2006. This important legislation extends preferential duty treatment for goods from developing countries.

As a part of the deal reached last night, we will update the definition of "core worker rights" in GSP to make it consistent with the ILO's 1998 definition of core worker rights.

This is important, of course, because in considering countries' eligibility for GSP benefits, the President must consider whether they are taking steps to protect core worker rights.

With the updated definition, the President's evaluation will now encompass countries' compliance with the ILO prohibition on the worst forms of child labor and the ILO prohibition on discrimination with respect to employment and occupation.

As I said when I began my remarks, I am very proud of this legislation. But it would not have been possible without the help of many of my colleagues.

So let me end with some thanks. First, on the TAA bill, Senators BINGAMAN and SNOWE have been instrumental in this process. And on the Andean trade bill, Senator BOB GRAHAM has been a tireless advocate.

I also thank Senator DASCHLE for his support through both the committee process and as we completed negotiations.

And finally, I thank two of my colleagues on the Finance Committee, Senator BREAUX and Senator PHIL GRAMM, for their help in reaching consensus on this deal.

I look forward to working with all of my colleagues to pass this important legislation.

Mr. President, I very shortly expect to go through the procedure where we can lay down this substitute amendment and begin working through various amendments that will be offered to that amendment. That should happen momentarily.

In the meantime, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 3401

(Purpose: To provide a substitute amendment)

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I have an amendment at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Montana [Mr. BAUCUS], for himself and Mr. GRASSLEY, proposes an amendment numbered 3401.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The text of the amendment is printed in today's RECORD under "Text of Amendments.")

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Michigan be recognized to speak as in morning business for up to 10 minutes and that I be recognized following that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Michigan.

PRESCRIPTION DRUGS

Ms. STABENOW. Mr. President, I come to the floor to discuss a letter Senator DAYTON and I are sending to the pharmaceutical companies of America—and invite colleagues to join with us in doing that—expressing our concern about articles we read yesterday about a campaign that evidently is starting through an organization to spend money on advertising, promoting what is a woefully inadequate plan for seniors and families that appears to be proposed by our colleagues in the House of Representatives through the Republican side of the aisle that in fact would be available, would pay less than 20 percent of the cost for our seniors on Medicare for their prescription drugs, and would use reductions in hospital fees—another cut to hospitals—and certainly in Michigan, whether it is our rural hospitals or urban hospitals, we have seen enough cuts and closures of hospitals and facilities. We don't need any more cuts in our hospitals.

But they are proposing to cut more reimbursements for hospitals and also to provide some kind of a per-visit fee for home health care. One of the things we heard was a $50 fee. We are getting this from the media, so it may not be the exact number. Regardless, the notion of adding some kind of a fee or copay for home health care and cutting hospitals further to pay for a woefully inadequate proposal that would pay for less than 20 percent of the costs that our seniors pay for their prescription drugs I find very disturbing.

We are hearing that the drug companies now are contributing $3 million for an unrestricted education grant to a group that is very closely aligned with them to run ads promoting this particular plan. The plan is good for the drug companies. It is not good for American seniors. It is not good for American families. It is not good for American business that is paying the tab for health care premium costs, whether it is a big business or a small business.

When we look at the $3 million they are willing to invest, again in advertising, promoting a plan that is good for them, bad for the American people, Senator DAYTON and I are sending a letter that basically will indicate we are asking them, instead of using the $3 million they are giving to this group to run advertising, to use the $3 million for lower prices, lower prices for our seniors.

Just to read a portion of this:

. . . we were greatly disturbed to read in yesterday's New York Times that the pharmaceutical industry is funding a group called United Seniors Association that will run television ads supporting the House Republican prescription drug plan . . . we have learned that the House bill is totally inadequate. . . .

The New York Times article states that drug companies will devote as much as $3 million for this media campaign. We respectfully urge you to redirect these funds and devote them to lowering the price of prescription drugs to all Americans, especially our nation's seniors. We think this would be a much better use of your profits.

This is a letter going to each of the companies urging them, rather than continuing to advertise excessively, 2½ times more in advertising than research on their products and continuing to fund groups that put forward plans that don't make any sense other than for the companies themselves—rather than spending all the money to do that, I invite the companies that do good work—we are proud of what they do and the lifesaving medicines they create—once they are created, we are asking them to work with us to make sure they are affordable to every American, that they are affordable to our seniors and our families; that a small business in America doesn't have to drop insurance coverage for employees because of rising, spiraling-out-of-control prescription drug prices. This is another example of $3 million going to fund an effort to stop the right thing from being done in the United States—a woefully inadequate plan. Instead of making the plan better, instead of spending the money to help lower prices so that more seniors don't walk away from the pharmacy without being able to get that prescription after looking at the price—instead of doing that, they are spending another $3 million in advertising and promoting a plan that doesn't make sense for America.

So I invite colleagues to join with Senator MARK DAYTON and me today in sending this letter and asking the companies—thank them for their good work, but ask them to join with us in a meaningful proposal for a Medicare prescription drug benefit, and also to take the dollars they are spending now to fight the efforts to lower prices, and just lower prices. They would get a lot further if they just put that money into lowering their prices so that it is more affordable for every American.

I urge my colleagues and invite them to join with Senator DAYTON and me to urge the companies to change their approach and work with us to lower prices for every American.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada is recognized.

MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we now proceed to a period for morning business for half an hour. Senator BYRD is going to give us his annual Mother's Day speech, which I have heard on a number of occasions, and I look forward to this one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

MOTHER'S DAY

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, this coming Sunday is Mother's Day, so recognized nationally. Of course, we all know that every day is Mother's Day. We should also know that simply having children does not make mothers. "Simply having children does not make mothers." That is a quotation that I have taken from John A. Shedd, a very apt quotation in today's culture.

Napoleon Bonaparte said, "The future destiny of the child is always the work of the mother."

All across the Nation, brunch reservations are being made, cards are being mailed, flowers are being ordered, gifts are being bought, and phone circuits will overload. It can mean only one thing, as I indicated earlier: This coming Sunday is Mother's Day. One day out of 365. Mother's Day.

In a great spasm of tender sentiment, Americans will set out to honor and celebrate the women most important to them—not Hollywood celebrities, not rock music stars—if stars we must call them at all—not fashion models, not athletes, but those who have devoted such energy and creativity to the timeless task of raising children and building families. I, too, wish to offer my tributes.

It is fitting that Mother's Day is celebrated in May, when the Earth is vibrant with new life. Mother birds are busy on the nest keeping hatchlings warm and their gaping mouths filled. In the tangled thickets, wild young are venturing forth from warren and den. The little foxes that, in the Bible references "spoil the vine," wrestle, and the little rabbits sample the first tiny wild strawberries. Butterflies visit the glossy, yellow buttercups and the snowy blossoms of the wild blackberries. The world seems as gentle, peaceable, and serene as any mother could wish for her children. Of course, we know the world is not always quite so benign, but we can still be impressed by those mothers who face tragedy with great courage in order to protect and shield their children. The mothers who lost husbands on September 11 and remained strong and positive examples for their children, when bitterness and despair would be so understandable, are heroes and heroines each and every day.

Mothers set indelible examples, the effects of which last for generations. My own mother, whose early death during the great flu pandemic in 1918 meant that I would be raised by relatives, should have left no trace upon my character. After all, I was only about a year old when she went to Heaven. Yet her selflessness in thinking of me on her deathbed, and expressing the wish that I would be cared for by one of my father's sisters, left me with the deep and abiding assurance of her love for me.

I had three older brothers and a sister, and it was in that great influenza epidemic that she was taken away, as millions of other mothers were taken away—perhaps 20 million people around the world lost their lives during that great influenza epidemic of 1917–1918. It is said that 12 million people in India died from the influenza, the swine flu. Perhaps 750,000 people in America died.

As I say, it was her wish, my mother's wish, that I be taken by one of my father's sisters whose name was Vlurma. I believe my father had nine sisters and perhaps two or three brothers, but it was one of his sisters, a sister who had married Titus Dalton Byrd, who took me in response to my dying mother's wish.

But for her wish, Mr. President, I would not be here today. I would never have gone to West Virginia to be reared in the coal mining communities in the southern part of the State had it not been for that mother's wish. I probably would have never sworn the oath in entering upon the office of U.S. Senator had it not been for that wish, my mother's wish, that I, the baby, should be brought up in the home of Titus Dalton Byrd and Vlurma Byrd, the only child in that home.

The Byrds had one child before I was born. That child was named Robert Madison Byrd. That child died of scarlet fever. The Byrds moved away from North Carolina and to West Virginia and moved me with them.

At first I had been named Cornelius Calvin Sale, Jr., by my father and my mother. My mother's name was Ada—Ada Mae. The two wonderful people who raised me changed my name to ROBERT CARLYLE BYRD.

So my mother's wish is a priceless gift even now, all of these years later. And the woman who raised me, my aunt, imbued me with her quiet faith and reverence for the Creator and impressed upon me her work ethic. I always call her "mom." She was the only mother I really ever knew. There are millions of other men and women around the world who can speak of their mothers as I have spoken of mine. They may have lost their mothers early or at some point along life's way. Many of them have sweet memories of those mothers. I do not have any memory of my mother, but somehow I know that her prayers have always followed me. I believe that. And I believe that she is in Heaven today.

The woman who reared me, my biological father's sister, was one of the few really, really great people I have known in my life. I had the good fortune to meet with many world leaders during my years in the Senate and especially during my years as majority leader in the Senate. I met with the Shah of Iran just a few weeks before he left Iran, never to return. I met with the current King of Jordan's father. I first met him 47 years ago. I met, as I mentioned earlier, the Shah of Iran. I first met him 47 years ago—in 1955.

I met with the President of Syria. I shook hands with Nassar of Egypt. I visited with and talked with German Chancellor Schmidt and German Chancellor Kohl. I met with Margaret Thatcher in her offices in London. I met with the Saudi family. I met with Prime Minister Begin of Israel. I met with Vice President Deng of China. I met with Mr. Khrushchev in the Crimea in his summer home.

I met with many other world leaders—Kings and Shahs and Princes and Presidents and Senators and Governors. These were outstanding personages, the leaders of the world. I had one-on-one meetings with these people. I met with President Sadat of Egypt. But the truly great people in my life and according to my standards were not national leaders or politicians, they were just common people. One of them was the man who raised me, Titus Dalton Byrd, a coal miner. I never heard him use God's name in vain in all of his life. He was a humble man. He paid his debts. He never spoke ill of a neighbor. He was a good man, as good as men can be. The Bible says no man is good, but he was as good as men become. He was a great man, in my sight.

The woman who raised me was a great woman. Neither of them had any education to amount to anything. I doubt that either of them had ever gone to the third grade in school. I was the first person in all of my family line who ever graduated from elementary school or from high school or from college.

They never made it to the third or fourth grade in school, but they were great souls, they had great hearts, they had honest minds, and they imbued me with a respect for the Bible and a respect for religion.

I can listen to any man's religion. It can be a man of Islam. It can be a Hindu. It can be a Protestant. It can be a Jew. I can listen to any of them. I can pray with any of them. That is the way I was taught.

These two people who raised me were great people. That aunt, as I say, I never knew any name for her but "Mom." I did not know that she was not my mother until I was in my year of graduation from high school. I can close my eyes and see her, after a long day, working to make ends meet in a hardscrabble West Virginia mining community, sitting at a scrubbed kitchen table, and discussing the Bible.

Those were some hard times in those days. When my wife and I married almost 65 years ago—in less than 3 weeks, if the Lord lets us live to see the day—our first refrigerator was half of an orange crate, or a grapefruit crate. I was a produce boy in a coal company store, so I sold grapefruits, oranges, other citrus fruits, other fruits, and vegetables. So I brought an empty orange crate home and nailed it up outside the kitchen window. That was during the Great Depression. During the late 1920s I lived as a boy on Wolf Creek in Mercer County, no electricity in the home, no running water in the house. Those were the days of the 2-cent stamp and the penny postcard.

I know what the word "mother" means, and I know what the word "father" means, even though my father and my angel mother did not rear me. But this old aunt and uncle who knew little about their ABCs but who knew much about life and about the things that count mostly in life, they reared me; they loved me. I heard "mom" pray many times in the stillness of the night. When the kerosene lamp was out, I would hear her voice coming from another room. I knew she was on her knees.

After I was elected to Congress, there were occasions when I would drive to West Virginia and go to her house. I would get there perhaps at 12, 1, or 2 in the morning. I would knock on the door, and she would answer the door. She would always ask me if I wanted her to fix me something to eat at that hour. Then after I spent most of the weekend in West Virginia and was about to return to Washington, she would fix a good noonday meal, and then say to me: "Robert, you be a good boy; I always pray for you."

It used to be when I was a little boy living on Wolf Creek Hollow, I would take bags of corn up to the mill on the top of the mountain. We had one horse named George. I had a pony. I would put a bag of corn across that pony's back, take it up to the mill, and the miller would grind the corn into meal, and that evening "mom" would make a cake of cornbread.

We had one cow, and sometimes "mom" would take me out with her to milk the cow. I would sit there and have a cup, and she would squeeze that milk down in the cup. I would drink that cup of milk with the foam freshly wrought from the bag of the cow.

I still see my aunt, who was—the only mother I ever really knew. She never kissed me in her life. I never received a mother's kiss, unlike Benjamin West, that great American painter who was living at the time the Constitution of the United States was written in Philadelphia. He would take to his mother, so the story goes, little drawings of birds and flowers, and she took him upon her knee. It is said that she kissed little Benjamin West's cheek as he sat on her knee and she told him he would grow up to be a great painter. So he grew up to be a painter of early American scenes. "The Death of General Wolfe" was by Benjamin West. The story is told that Benjamin West said a mother's kiss made him a great painter.

I do not remember ever receiving a mother's kiss, but I received "mom's" love. I still see her in my mind's eye when my wife Erma and I sit together on Sundays and read the Bible. My aunt taught me a great deal about the quiet dignity with which she lived her life. Mothers teach when they insist that their children brush their teeth and eat their vegetables. Mothers teach by saying bedtime prayers, by reading bedtime stories, and by singing lullabies. As I say, simply having children does not make mothers, but mothers do sing lullabies at the bedsides of their children.

They demonstrate their love not only through hugs and praise, but in each meal they make, each load of laundry they fold, each toy they put away. Children absorb lessons from the people around them, and especially from the parents they look up to. So, mothers teach by example when they read themselves instead of watching television, the vast wasteland that numbs peoples' minds or by being careful with their speech and with the way they live their lives. Each small lesson helps to weave the cloth of their children's lives. It is for these daily lessons, the laughter shared and tears dried, that we put so much effort into making Mother's Day special. And we ought to make it special. We ought to see Mother on this Mother's Day and every other day of the year that it is possible.

A poem by an anonymous poet captures the inspiration that mothers provide:

WHEN MOTHER READS ALOUD

When Mother reads aloud, the past
Seems real as every day;
I hear the tramp of armies vast,
I see the spears and lances cast,
I join the trilling fray;
Brave knights and ladies fair and proud
I meet when Mother reads aloud.
When Mother reads aloud, far lands
Seem very near and true;
I cross the desert's gleaming sands,
Or hunt the jungle's prowling bands,
Or sail the ocean blue.
Far heights, whose peaks the cold mists shroud,
I scale, when Mother reads aloud.
When Mother reads aloud, I long
For noble deeds to do
To help the right, redress the wrong;
It seems so easy to be strong,
So simple to be true.
Oh, thick and fast the visions crowd
My eyes, when Mother reads aloud.

Manufacturers of greeting cards, florists, jewelers, clothing stores, even the phone company suggest that their products are treasured by mothers, and I am sure that they are. But mothers also treasure the lumpy clay vases made by young potters and filled with wild flowers torn from the yard. Mothers love the care and love that their loved ones put into this celebration. Flowers or no flowers, homemade cards or store-bought, mothers love being surrounded by their families most of all. Each child is some mother's treasure, her precious angel, even when that child is grown and gone to far away places. A mother's children are her greatest works, her magnum opus, her masterpiece. A phone call or a meal shared together provides an opportunity to relive the memories that make each family special. Erma and I can look around the table as we think of her mother, Erma's mother, a fine Christian woman who lived a good life. A wonderful mother-in-law. We think of her as we sit around the table with our two lovely daughters and their families knowing that our two newest members, our little great granddaughters,—let me repeat that, our little great-granddaughter, are fortunate to share in our close-knit family.

As in all families, my mother, my aunt who raised me, my wife, my daughters, my granddaughters and my great-granddaughters our grandsons, our daughters-in-law, our sons-in-law, all share many titles. They are proud citizens of this fair land. They are strong, talented, independent women.

They may hold many business titles. They are sisters, cousins, and aunts. They are, or may be, wives. But the title, the job, that will give them the greatest pleasure in their lives, will be to be called "Mother." Remember that simply having children does not make mothers. The title comes with much labor, much patience some tedium, hopefully not too many tears, and love beyond measure. The job will call upon their every reserve of strength and every ounce of creativity, but it will never tax their ability to love and to cherish.

This Sunday, scrubbed and shining, let us present the mothers in our lives with fitting tribute. Give them flowers, cards, good food, and presents, but most of all, let us give them our gratitude and repay, in small measure, the love and devotion that they have showered upon us.

I close with a few stanzas from a poem by Elizabeth Akers Allen. It is called "Rock Me to Sleep."

I offer it to my own sweet angel mother, who hears me now, who is listening today with millions of other mothers like her who have gone on to that land where the flowers never wither and the rainbow never fades.

Backward, turn backward, O time, in your flight,
Make me a child again just for to-night!
Mother, come back from the echoless shore,
Take me again to your heart as of yore;
Kiss from my forehead the furrows of care,
Smooth the few silver threads from my hair;
Over my slumbers your loving watch keep;—
Rock me to sleep, Mother—rock me to sleep!
Over my heart, in the days that are flown,
No love like mother-love ever has shone;
No other worship abides and endures—
Faithful, unselfish, and patient like yours:
None like a mother can charm away pain
From the sick soul and the world-weary brain.
Slumber's soft calms o'er my heavy lids creep;—
Rock me to sleep, Mother—rock me to sleep!
Mother, dear Mother, the years have been long
Since I last listened your lullaby song:
Sing, then, and unto my soul it shall seem
Womanhood's years have been only a dream.
Clasped to your heart in a loving embrace,
With your light lashes just sweeping my face,
Never hereafter to wake or to weep;—
Rock me to sleep, Mother—rock me to sleep!

I will yield the floor and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent the Senate now proceed to a period of morning business, with Senators permitted to speak therein for a period not to exceed 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TRIBUTE TO THE CITY OF IDABEL ON ITS 100TH ANNIVERSARY

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, it is an honor for me to recognize the 100th Anniversary of the City of Idabel, Oklahoma.

Idabel is the county seat of McCurtain County, located in the Southeast corner of Oklahoma. The scenic rivers and wilderness that surround Idabel rival the beauty of any region in the United States.

Idabel has a rich cultural history. For 75 years, from the 1830s into the twentieth century, Idabel was under the sovereignty of the Choctaw Tribe. Following their removal from Mississippi, the Choctaws occupied and ruled over the land that we today know as Idabel.

In 1902, before Oklahoma even became a state, the town of Purnell was incorporated along a rail line. It was named after Isaac Purnell, a railroad official at the time. This name did not last long, however. Our very own United States Postal Service rejected the town's name because it was too similar to that of another Oklahoma town Purcell. For two years, this incorporated town batted possible names around, names like Mitchell and Hoyopa, until finally settling on the name "Idabel"—a combination of the first names of Isaac Purnell's daughters.

While rich in its history and in the beauty of its surroundings, the greatest part of Idabel are the people who live there from the people who set up shop in that small trade village in the early twentieth century to the present day students, the Idabel Warriors, who are the future of this great town.

The people of Idabel are devoted to God, to their country, and to their families. I am proud to honor their centennial, and am privileged to serve as their representative here in the U.S. Senate. May their next one hundred years be as fruitful as the first.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

NURSES' WEEK

• Mr. CLELAND. Mr. President, this week commemorates the contributions of the nursing profession to patients and health care and the dedication of those individuals who have chosen nursing. Yet in all the years that we have acknowledged how much nurses mean to the delivery of health care and our quality of life, we have not done enough to ensure the viability of nursing as a profession. The 2001 American Nurses Association (ANA) National Survey revealed that 715 hospitals had 126,000 openings for nursing positions and an 11 percent vacancy rate. Nursing schools across the country report that enrollment has significantly decreased and the ANA also projects that 65 percent of present nurses will retire within this decade. These statistics signal a nursing crisis and that means a health care crisis for this country.

At both the June 14, 2001, Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee hearing on the looming nursing shortage and the June 27, 2001, Governmental Affairs Subcommittee hearing on the federal government's role in retaining nurses for delivery of federally funded health care services, I emphasized an alarming statistic that the federal health sector, employing approximately 45,000 nurses, may be the hardest hit in the near future with an estimated 47 percent of its nursing workforce eligible for retirement by the year 2004. Current and anticipated nursing vacancies in all health care settings are attributed in part to worsening work place conditions with mandatory overtime and increasing patient care workloads.

I believe today we are facing a widespread and complex challenge with this nursing shortage and there are no quick fixes. Congress has passed some important measures to help nurses to continue to take safe and effective care of their patients and to assist health care facilities to recruit and retain needed nurses. Some of these important measures will help recruit new nurses and assist with the cost of education, like the Nurse Reinvestment Act and S. 937 which I authored and which will now permit the transfer of entitlement to educational assistance under the Montgomery GI Bill by members of the Armed Forces thus allowing spouses and children of eligible service members to use transferred GI bill assistance for undergraduate or graduate nursing education.

Additionally, the VA Nurse Recruitment and Retention Enhancement Act was signed into law this year and will help to alleviate the anticipated VA nursing shortage by addressing working conditions, implementing a Nurse Cadet Program to encourage high school students to pursue nursing careers as well as other education incentives. I was pleased to have played a major role in development and passing this measure as well.

Congress, Federal and State agencies, private and public health care organizations are all actively working to develop solutions to the looming nursing shortage. We want nurses to know that they do have allies who will work with them to find solutions.

To further demonstrate our support of nurses, I am also proposing that the U.S. Postal Service issue a nursing stamp to say, "Thank you for being a Nurse." This stamp will help to raise public awareness of the nursing crisis and show our support of the nursing profession.

I ask my colleagues to join with me in a long-term commitment to support the nursing profession. I want to say a special "thank you" to the nurses who were there for me when I was injured in Vietnam. These nurses gave me care and hope. I do not care to think of the future of health care without these dedicated and knowledgeable nurses.●

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

At 11:40 a.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Hays, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker has signed the following enrolled bill:

S. 378. An act to redesignate the Federal building located at 3348 South Kedzie Avenue, in Chicago, Illinois, as the "Paul Simon Chicago Jobs Corps Center."

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The following petitions and memorials were laid before the Senate and were referred or ordered to lie on the table as indicated:

POM–232. An engrossed resolution adopted by the Assembly of the State of Wisconsin relative to the Upper Mississippi and Illinois Rivers' Inland Waterways Transportation System; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

2001 ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION 56

Whereas, the state of Wisconsin borders or contains over 360 miles of the upper Mississippi River and 11 navigation locks and dams along those borders; and

Whereas, many of Wisconsin's locks and dams are more than 60 years old and only 600 feet long, making them unable to accommodate modern barge tows of 1,200 feet long, nearly tripling locking times and causing lengthy delays and ultimately increasing shipping costs; and

Whereas, the use of 1,200-foot locks has been proven nationwide as the best method of improving efficiency, reducing congestion, and modernizing the inland waterways; and

Whereas, the construction of the lock and dam system has spurred economic growth and a higher standard of living in the Mississippi and Illinois river basin, and today supplies more than 300,000,000 tons of the nation's cargo, supporting more than 400,000 jobs, including 90,000 in manufacturing; and

Whereas, more than 60% of American agricultural exports, including corn, wheat, and soybeans, are shipped down the Mississippi and Illinois rivers on the way to foreign markets; and

Whereas, Wisconsin farmers, producers, and consumers rely on efficient transportation to remain competitive in a global economy, and efficiencies in river transport offset higher production costs compared to those incurred by foreign competitors; and

Whereas, the upper Mississippi and Illinois rivers lock and dam system saves our nation more than $1.5 billion in higher transportation costs each year, and failing to construct 1,200-foot locks will cause farmers to use more expensive alternative modes of transportation, including trucks and trains; and

Whereas, according to the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, congestion along the upper Mississippi and Illinois rivers is costing Wisconsin and other producers and consumers in the basin $98,000,000 per year in higher transportation costs; and

Whereas, river transportation is the most environmentally friendly form of transporting goods and commodities, creating almost no noise pollution and emitting 35% to 60% fewer pollutants than either trucks or trains, according to the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency; and

Whereas, moving away from river transport would add millions of trucks and railcars to our nation's infrastructure, adding air pollution, traffic congestion, and greater wear and tear on highways; and

Whereas, backwater lakes created by the lock and dam system provide breeding grounds for migratory waterfowl and fish; and

Whereas, the lakes and 500 miles of wildlife refuge also support a one-billion-dollar per year recreational industry, including hunting, fishing, and tourism jobs; and

Whereas, upgrading the system of locks and dams on the upper Mississippi and Illinois rivers will provide 3,000 construction and related jobs over a 15-year to 20-year period; and

Whereas, in 1999 the state of Wisconsin shipped 1,100,000 tons of commodities, including grain, coal, chemicals, aggregates, and other products; and

Whereas, 3,900,000 tons of commodities, including grain, coal, chemicals, aggregates, and other products, were shipped to, from, and within Wisconsin by barge, representing $313,000,000 in value; and

Whereas, shippers moving by barge in Wisconsin realized a savings of approximately $40,000,000 compared to other transportation modes; and

Whereas, Wisconsin docks shipped products by barge to 6 states and received products from 11 states; and

Whereas, there are approximately 20 manufacturing facilities, terminals, and docks on the waterways of Wisconsin, representing thousands of jobs in the state; and

Whereas, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers is conducting a collaborative navigation study of the economic and environmental factors to be considered when examining capital improvements to the upper Mississippi River system; and

Whereas, the navigation study will release initial results in a summer 2002 report; now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly, That the Wisconsin assembly formally recognizes the upper Mississippi River as a river of statewide significance for natural, navigational, and recreational benefits; and, be it further

Resolved, That the Wisconsin assembly recognizes the importance of timely modernization of the inland waterway transportation infrastructure to Wisconsin agriculture and industry in this state, the region, and the nation and, pending results of the navigation study, urges Congress to authorize funding to construct 1,200-foot locks on the upper Mississippi and Illinois river system; and, be it further

Resolved, That the assembly chief clerk shall transmit copies of this resolution to the president and secretary of the U.S. senate, the speaker and clerk of the U.S. house of representatives, the chair of the senate committee on commerce, science, and transportation, the chair of the house committee on transportation and infrastructure, and the members of the congressional delegation from this state.

POM–233. An engrossed resolution adopted by the Senate of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin relative to autism spectrum disorder; to the Committee on Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions.

2001 SENATE RESOLUTION 16

Whereas, autism spectrum disorder has been labeled the silent epidemic of our time, silent because this developmental disorder has robbed at least 400,000 children of their ability to communicate and interact with their families and loved ones, and silent because there are currently no established autism registries in the nation to tell us how many people are actually afflicted with this disorder; and

Whereas, current statistics tell us that autism affects at least one in every 500 children in America, and recent anecdotal evidence suggests that autism rates are increasing to possible one in every 250 children; and

Whereas, the U.S. house of representatives has passed a resolution, H. CON. RES. 91, recognizing the importance of increasing awareness of autism spectrum disorder, and supporting programs for greater research and improved treatment of autism and improved training and support for individuals with autism and those who care for them; now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate, That: the members of the Wisconsin Senate urge the U.S. Senate to concur in H. CON. RES. 91; and, be it further

Resolved, That the Senate chief clerk shall provide a copy of this resolution to each member of the Wisconsin congressional delegation, to the members of the U.S. Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions, to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the secretary of the U.S. Senate, and to the clerk of the U.S. House of Representatives.

POM–234. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Maine relative to memorializing congress to adopt Patriots' Day as a holiday throughout the United States of America; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

JOINT RESOLUTION

Whereas, Patriots' Day commemorates the American Revolution and the legendary battles at Lexington and Concord in 1775; and

Whereas, these historic events led to the colonies' independence from Great Britain and subsequently to the formation of the United States of America; and

Whereas, great patriotism was demonstrated by the Americans after the terrorist attacks in New York City, Washington, D.C. and Pennsylvania on September 11, 2001; and

Whereas, Patriots' Day, a holiday in reverence of our unity as a nation, is celebrated only in Maine and Massachusetts; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That We, your Memorialists, urge the Congress of the United States to encourage all of the United States of America to observe Patriots' Day on April 15, 2002 in remembrance of the founding of this nation and the patriotism shown by Americans after September 11, 2001; and be it further

Resolved, That suitable copies of this resolution, duly authenticated by the Secretary of State, be transmitted to the Honorable George W. Bush, President of the United States, and to the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and each Member of the Maine Congressional Delegation.

POM–235. A Senate concurrent resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania relative to honoring Commodore John Barry as the first flag officer of the United States Navy; to the Committee on Armed Services.

Senate Resolution

Whereas, Commodore John Barry, an American merchant marine captain and native of County Wexford, Ireland, volunteered his services to the Continental Navy during the Revolutionary War; and

Whereas, Throughout his career, Commodore Barry not only provided the first and last victories at sea for the American revolutionaries but also was responsible for the organization of the historic crossing of the Delaware River by General George Washington; and

Whereas, Under President Washington, Commodore Barry built and first commanded the United States Navy and the squadron that included his flagship, the USS United States, and the USS Constitution, "Old Ironsides"; and

Whereas, Commodore Barry served as head of the United States Navy under Presidents Washington, Adams and Jefferson; therefore be it

Resolved (the House of Representatives concurring), That the General Assembly memorialize the Congress of the United States to honor Commodore John Barry as the first flag officer of the United States Navy; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the presiding officers of each house of Congress and to all members of Congress from Pennsylvania.

POM–236. A resolution adopted by the House of the Legislature of the State of Vermont relative to the National Guard; to the Committee on Armed Services.

House Resolution 37

Whereas, within days of the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in New York City and Washington, D.C., the nation's governors activated National Guard soldiers and airmen to augment security at 422 of the nation's international airports, and

Whereas, in true state-federal partnership, National Guard forces are providing aerial port security under the command and control of the sovereign states, territories, and the District of Columbia, and the federal government is funding such duties "in the service of the United States" under 32 U.S.C. §502(f) hereinafter referred to as "Title 32 duty", and

Whereas, Title 32 duty has been used, inter alia, for more than 20 years for National Guard full-time staffing, for National Guard support for local, state, and federal law enforcement agencies under Governors' Counter-Drug Plans for more than 12 years, for National Guard Civil Support Team technical assistance for local first responders for more than two years, and for aerial port security following the attacks of September 11. Of particular note, the National Guard Counter-Drug Program has long included Title 32 support for United States Customs, Border Patrol, and Immigration and Naturalization Service activities at United States Ports of Entry, and

Whereas, in the aftermath of the September 11 attacks, increased security and inadequate federal staffing have limited the flow of persons, goods, and services across our nation's borders. These factors have contributed to a weakening of the American and Canadian economies, and

Whereas, the governors of northern tier border states wrote President Bush in November 2001, offering to provide Title 32 National Guard augmentation for United States Customs, Border Patrol, and Immigration and Naturalization Service operations at United States Ports of Entry. Such relief could have been, and still can be, effected within days of acceptance by the federal government, and

Whereas, there is still no relief at our borders due to inaction on the governors' offer of Title 32 National Guard assistance and conflicting Department of Defense proposals to federalize the National Guard or otherwise enhance border security with active duty military personnel instead of Title 32 National Guard members, and

Whereas, federalizing the National Guard under U.S.C. Title 10 would degrade the combat readiness of units from which Guardsmen would be mobilized, interfere with effective state force management, and prevent personal accommodations for soldiers and their civilian employers, and

Whereas, stationing federal military forces at the United States-Canada border would be an unprecedented unilateral action by the United States, and

Whereas, the nation's border states need prompt relief which can best be provided by Title 32 National Guard forces being deployed to assist lead federal agencies at the borders "in the service of the United States", but under continued state command and control, and

Whereas, the Vermont State Legislature opposes federalization of the National Guard or assignment of federal military forces for United States border security, now therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That this legislative body urges the President and U.S. Congress to assure prompt augmentation of lead federal agencies at the borders by accepting the governors' offer of National Guard forces under state command and control pursuant to 32 U.S.C. §502(f), and be it further

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to send copies of this resolution to President George W. Bush, the President of the U.S. Senate, the Speaker of the U.S. Houses of Representatives, and to the members of the Vermont Congressional Delegation.

POM–237. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Maine relative to the intent to fund 40% of the costs of special education or amend the individuals with disabilities education act to allow the states more flexibility in implementing its mandates; to the Committee on Appropriations.

Joint Resolution

Whereas, the Congress of the United States has found that all children deserve a quality education, including children with disabilities; and

Whereas, the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act, 20 United States Code, Section 1400, et seq., provides that the Federal Government and the State and local governments are to share in the expense of education for children with disabilities and commits the Federal Government to provide funds to assist with the excess of expenses of education for children with disabilities; and

Whereas, the Congress of the United States has committed to contribute up to 40% of the average per pupil expenditure of educating children with disabilities and the Federal Government has failed to meet this commitment to assist the states; and

Whereas, the Federal Government has never contributed more than 12.6% of the national average per pupil expenditure to assist with the excess expenses of educating children with disabilities under the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act; and

Whereas, this failure of the Federal Government to meet its commitment to assist with the excess expenses of educating a child with a disability contradicts the goal of ensuring that children with disabilities receive a quality education; and

Whereas, the federal grant funds in the State for children zero to 2 years of age represent only 30% of the cost of serving eligible infants and toddlers in the State, and if the federal grants were at the 40% level, the award to the State this year would have increased by $582,000; and

Whereas, the federal grant funds in the state for children 3 to 5 years of age represent only 8% of the cost of serving children 3 to 5 years of age in the State, and if the federal grants were at the 40% level, the award to the State this year would have increased by $10,086,000; and

Whereas, the federal grant funds in the State for children 5 to 20 years of age represent only 9.75% of the State's total special education expenditures of $225,130,000, and if the federal grants were at the 40% level, the award to the State this year would have increased by more than $68,000,000; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, your Memorialists, respectfully urge and request that the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States either provide 40% of the national average per pupil expenditure to assist states and local education agencies with the excess costs of educating children with disabilities or amend the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act to allow the states more flexibility in implementing its mandates; and be it further

Resolved, That suitable copies of this resolution, duly authenticated by the Secretary of state, be transmitted to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and to each Member of the Maine Congressional Delegation.

POM–238. A resolution adopted by the House of the Legislature of the State of Florida relative to supporting the commitment of funding necessary for the continued development, permanent establishment and future operation of the Center for Coastal and Maritime security by the Coastal Systems Station of the United States Navy; to the Committee on Appropriations.

House Resolution No. 9003C

Whereas, on September 11, 2001, the United States of America was the victim of a cowardly attack conducted by terrorists supported by foreign nations, and

Whereas, these attacks have placed our nation's military on high alert in order to protect our citizens and visitors to the United States from future aggression, and

Whereas, our nation has over 12,000 miles of coastline, over 2,000 miles of which are found in the State of Florida, and

Whereas, 14 active seaports, thousands of miles of rivers and inland waterways, countless marinas, and the center of the world's marine cruise industry are located in Florida, and

Whereas, the vastness of our nation's coastline increases the probability that future attackers could enter the country at our seaports, maritime commerce centers, energy facilities, and marine recreational centers, and

Whereas, for more than 50 years, the United States Navy's Coastal Systems Station in Panama City, Florida, has provided unequaled training, mission planning, and equipment development in the area of coastal operations and systems to all branches of the United States military, and

Whereas, the Coastal Systems Station is a field activity of the Naval Sea Systems Command and is one of the major research, development, test, and evaluation laboratories of the United States Navy, with a wide base of expertise in engineering and scientific disciplines, and

Whereas, the Coastal Systems Station is the Navy's premier organization for the comprehensive support of mission areas within coastal environments, which include mine warfare, amphibious warfare, special warfare, diving and life support, and coastal operations, and

Whereas, the United States Navy's Coastal Systems Station is currently in the process of developing, and seeks to permanently establish, the Center for Coastal and Maritime Security, the purpose of which is to provide specialized training and technology for civilian and military personnel to defend our nation against maritime terrorist threats, and

Whereas, given the events of September 11, 2001, it is now a matter of the highest importance that the numerous means of ingress to this country provided through the nation's vast coastal area as be secured and made invulnerable to any form of malicious breach, and

Whereas, to that end, it is essential that the Center for Coastal and Maritime Security be fully developed, permanently established, and operated by the United States Navy Coastal Systems Station, Now, Therefore,

Be it Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Florida, That the President of the United States and the United States Congress are urged to support and commit necessary funding for the continued development, permanent establishment, and future operation of the Center for Coastal and Maritime Security. Be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, and to each member of the Florida Delegation to the United States Congress.

POM–239. A resolution adopted by the Senate of the Legislature of the State of Kansas relative to the Medicare program to pay for all oral cancer drugs; to the Committee on Finance.

Senate Resolution No. 1826

Whereas, Cancer is a leading cause of morbidity and mortality in the State of Kansas and throughout the nation; and

Whereas, Cancer is disproportionately a disease of the elderly, with more than half of all cancer diagnoses occurring in persons age 65 or older, many of whom are dependent on the federal Medicare program for provision of cancer care; and

Whereas, Since treatment with drugs is the cornerstone of modern cancer care, elderly cancer patients must have access to potentially life-extending drug therapy, but the Medicare program's coverage of drugs is limited to injectable drugs or oral drugs that have an injectable version; and

Whereas, The nation's investment in biomedical research has begun to bear fruit with a compelling array of new oral cancer drugs that are less toxic, more effective and more cost-effective than existing therapies, but because such drugs do not have an injectable equivalent, they are not covered by Medicare; and

Whereas, Noncoverage of these important new products leaves many Medicare beneficiaries confronting the choice of either substantial out-of-pocket personal costs or selection of more toxic, less effective treatments that are covered by the program; and

Whereas, Medicare's failure to cover oral cancer drugs leaves at risk many beneficiaries suffering from blood-related cancers like leukemia, lymphoma and myeloma, as well as cancers of the breast, lung and prostate; and

Whereas, Certain members of the United States Congress have recognized the necessity of Medicare coverage for all oral cancer drugs and introduced legislation in the 107th Congress to achieve that result (H.R. 1624; S. 913); Now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of Kansas, That the Senate respectfully urges the Congress of the United States to adopt legislation requiring the Medicare program to cover all oral cancer drugs; and

Be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit enrolled copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, the Secretary of Health and Human Services and each member of the Kansas congressional delegation.

POM–240. A concurrent resolution adopted by the Senate of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana relative to the Act to Leave No Child Behind; to the Committee on Finance.

Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 20

Whereas, approximately 11.6 million children across the United States live in poverty and nearly 9.2 million children in America do not have health insurance; and

Whereas, only three out of five eligible preschool children are able to participate in Head Start programs; and

Whereas, only 12 percent of eligible children receive child care assistance through the Child Care and Development Block Grant; and

Whereas, approximately one-third of parents who stop receiving Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF) find little or no work and out of the two-thirds who stop receiving TANF and do find jobs, only 40 percent are stable, year-round jobs; and

Whereas, many families are not receiving the food stamps, Medicaid, child care, or other supports for which they are eligible; and

Whereas, three million children in the United States are suffering "worst case" housing needs such that their families are paying over half of their income for rent or are living in overcrowded or substandard housing; and

Whereas, nine youths are killed in the United States by firearms everyday; and

Whereas, nearly 8,000 children a day are reported to public welfare agencies as abused and/or neglected and over 2.5 million children live with grandparents or in foster family homes, group homes, or child care institutions; and

Whereas, seven million children in the United States are regularly left at home alone after school each week; and

Whereas, federal legislation, the Act to Leave No Child Behind (S.940/H.R. 1990), will help address these and many other needs of children in Louisiana and across America; and

Whereas, Louisiana is committed to improving the lives of children and ensuring that all of our children are afforded the opportunity to grow up healthy, safe, educated, and free from poverty. Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Legislature of Louisiana does hereby memorialize the Louisiana congressional delegation and the United States Congress to support the Act to Leave No Child Behind. Be it further

Resolved, That the Legislature of Louisiana does hereby endorse the Act to Leave No Child Behind and the efforts being made to make certain that no child is left behind. Be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this Resolution be transmitted to each member of the Louisiana congressional delegation and to the presiding officers of the United States House of Representatives and the United States Senate.

POM–241. A resolution adopted by the Senate of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts relative to welfare reform; to the Committee on Finance.

Resolution

Whereas, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts adopted its own version of "welfare reform" in 1995, taking into account the nature of labor market in Massachusetts, the financial resources of the Commonwealth and the particular needs of low-income families with children; and

Whereas, The Federal Government in 1995 granted Massachusetts a waiver from the then-existing Federal requirements enabling Massachusetts to implement its version of welfare reform; and

Whereas, The Federal Government in 1996 adopted its version of welfare reform, TANF, and, in recognition of their leading roles, allowed Massachusetts and other states with pre-existing waivers to continue to operate their programs under such waivers; and

Whereas, one purpose of TANF was to allow states greater flexibility to operate their cash assistance programs for needy families; and

Whereas, since 1995, the number of Massachusetts families receiving cash assistance from the Commonwealth has declined by more than 50 percent; and

Whereas, almost half of the Massachusetts families continuing to receive cash assistance are families including a family member with a disability or with very young children; and

Whereas, under the Massachusetts program operated under the Federal waiver, such families are exempt from the time limits and work requirements; and

Whereas, because of adverse economic conditions in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and around the country, the number of low-income families needing cash assistance has started to rise; and

Whereas, because the original TANF law barred states from using Federal TANF funds to provide assistance to certain legal immigrant families, Massachusetts, since 1997, has expended state funds to provide needed services to immigrant families; and

Whereas, the 1996 Federal Welfare Reform Law expires on September 30, 2002 and must be reauthorized by the United States Congress and the President on or before that date; and

Whereas, the Massachusetts waiver will expire in 2005 unless the state is allowed to renew it; and

Whereas, without the waiver, Massachusetts may suffer Federal financial penalties for continuing to operate its own program and incur substantial additional costs related to child care, transportation, and other supportive services; and

Whereas, the Federal TANF block grant received annually by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has declined in real value by 13 percent since 1996 and, if continued at current levels, will decline further in real value over the next several years; and

Whereas, without additional Federal TANF funding, Massachusetts may be forced to cut back on existing services for needy families; and

Whereas, the National Governors' Association has called on Congress to allow states with waivers to continue operating under them, to increase TANF funding and to allow states with greater flexibility in operating their TANF programs; now therefore be it

Resolved, that any reauthorized TANF law should include:

A. Authority for Massachusetts and other states with pre-existing waivers to continue and renew them at state option;

B. Increased TANF block grant funding for Massachusetts;

C. Increased flexibility for states to determine what activities and what level of participation should satisfy Federal work requirements, in part to enable states appropriately to meet the needs of low-income families with disabilities;

D. Increased flexibility for states to grant hardship exemptions from the Federal 5-year time limit on receipt of TANF assistance, in part to enable states appropriately to meet the needs of low-income families with disabilities;

E. Removal of restrictions on states using TANF funds to provide benefits to legal immigrants; and be it further

Resolved, that the members of the Massachusetts delegation to the Congress of the United States should actively seek to ensure that the provisions listed above are included in any reauthorized TANF law; and be it further

Resolved, that a copy of these resolutions be transmitted forthwith by the Clerk of the Senate to the President of the United States, to the Presiding Officer of each branch of Congress and to the members thereof from this Commonwealth.

POM-242. A joint resolution adopted by the House of the Legislature of the State of Maine relative to correcting inequities for retirees drawing social security benefits; to the Committee on Finance.

JOINT RESOLUTION

Whereas, retirees covered by federal, state or local government retirement programs are facing hardship in retirement; and

Whereas, the retirement benefits of these retirees are low and the cost of health insurance is high and climbing every year; and

Whereas, added to this bleak economic picture, even though many of these retirees may qualify for Social Security through their own or their spouses' work, Congress will not let them benefit as other citizens do; and

Whereas, the first roadblock, the windfall elimination provision of the federal Social Security Act, requires 30 years of "substantial earnings," as rated on a scale, before a retiree is eligible for the full Social Security benefit. If a retiree does not have 30 years, or some years fall below the standard, the Social Security benefit may be reduced or eliminated; therefore, retirees who earned a pension from working for a government agency and also worked part-time under Social Security may see their Social Security benefits reduced or eliminated; and

Whereas, the 2nd roadblock the government pension offset of the federal Social Security Act, reduces the survivor benefit under Social Security by 2/3 of an individual's retirement benefit. This means the death of a spouse of a retiree is a double tragedy because the offset will reduce the family income by 1/3 or more and then freeze it at that level. Any future increase in the retiree's retirement will result in the loss of Social Security benefits; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That We, your Memorialists, support the repeal of the government pension offset and the windfall elimination provision from the federal Social Security Act; and be it further

Resolved, That suitable copies of this resolution, duly authenticated by the Secretary of State, be transmitted to the President of the United States Senate, to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives and to each member of the Maine Congressional Delegation.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. CAMPBELL:

S. 2503. A bill to amend title 49, United States Code, to permit an individual to operate a commercial motor vehicle solely within the borders of a State if the individual meets certain minimum standards prescribed by the State, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. President, today I am introducing companion legislation to H.R. 2466, the Commercial Driver's License Devolution Act of 2001, which was originally brought to the floor of the House of Representatives last July by my friend from North Carolina, Representative HOWARD COBLE.

I believe it is no secret to my colleagues here in the Senate, that I support small business and returning power to the States. The traditional, one-size-fits-all approach to governing has done more harm than good, and this bill is an attempt to remedy some of that.

This legislation will give States the option to establish their own commercial driver's license, CDL, requirements for intrastate drivers. It will return power to the States by giving them the option to license intrastate drivers of commercial motor vehicles based upon testing standards determined by the individual States. And I stress, it will be an "option."

I want to emphasize that this legislation is not a Federal mandate imposed on States. States that choose not to participate would remain under Federal guidelines. A State that chooses to exercise this option would in no way diminish the role of the CDL in the long-haul trucking industry. Additionally, this legislation effectively precludes two or more States from using this option as the basis for an interstate compact.

As I am sure my colleagues are aware, the Commercial Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1986, CMVSA, required States to establish a new and uniform program of testing and licensure for all operators of commercial vehicles both intra and interstate. The principal objectives of the Act have been met, and would not be harmed by this legislation I'm introducing here today.

I have no issue with the CMVSA. It is a good law, and at the time the provisions it contained were necessary and timely for improving the standards of performance for long-haul truck drivers in this country. However, I, like my counterpart in the House, believe the CMVSA was imposed upon intrastate commerce where the operation of trucks may be a small but necessary part of an individual's job. Therefore, the reality was that Washington imposed its will on thousands of small businesses across this country who aren't involved in long-haul trucking and we expected them to adjust to any circumstance that might arise. That's unfair and not what government is supposed to be about.

When you have conditions such as these, I believe it should be within a State's discretion to determine what kind of commercial vehicle licensure and testing is required for commerce taking place solely within its borders.

This legislation is important to our Nation's small businesses, especially those dependent upon commercial truck travel, which means it's important to the consumers. I urge my colleagues in the Senate to support it.

By Mr. HATCH:

S. 2504. A bill to extend eligibility for refugee status of unmarried sons and daughters of certain Vietnamese refugees; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a Senate companion to H.R. 1840, a bill to extend the eligibility for refugee status of immigrants who are the unmarried children of qualified Vietnamese nationals. This bill would extend the authority to process such individuals through fiscal year 2003, as it was set to expire earlier this year. The House and Senate have been in communication regarding this bill for some time, and given that the Senate Judiciary Committee approved the House version of this bill by unanimous consent this morning, I have little doubt that the entire Senate will extend their support.

This is a very important piece of legislation and one that will provide crucial relief to a small, yet deserving group of people, the children of those Vietnamese nationals who were placed in internment camps by the Socialist Republic of Vietnam and are now in the United States as refugees. We simply cannot expect the sons and daughters of these Vietnamese nationals to be forgotten. It is our duty to support the sacrifices that these families made for freedom and democracy and I find it most appropriate that we prevent further persecution by welcoming their children.

I want to commend Congressman TOM DAVIS on his introduction of this legislation in the House. I urge my Senate colleagues' support.

By Mr. KENNEDY (for himself, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. DODD, Mr. HAGEL, Mr. SMITH of Oregon, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. BROWNBACK, Mr. JEFFORDS, Mr. DURBIN, and Mr. FEINGOLD):

S. 2505. A bill to promote the national security of the United States through international educational and cultural exchange programs between the United States and the Islamic world, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, today, Senators LUGAR, LEAHY, CHAFEE, DODD, HAGEL, GORDON SMITH, COCHRAN, BROWNBACK, JEFFORDS, DURBIN, FEINGOLD and I are introducing legislation to increase the level of student and other exchanges between Americans and visitors from the Islamic world.

Our legislation, the Cultural Bridges Act, would authorize $75 million above current appropriations in fiscal years 2003 through 2007 to expand the activities of the State Department's existing educational and cultural programs in the Islamic world. It would also authorize $20 million in fiscal years 2003 through 2007 for the Department of State to establish a new high school student exchange program to enable a small number of competitively selected students from the Islamic world to study in the United States at a public high school for an academic year.

There are no better ambassadors for American values than Americans themselves, and student exchange programs have proven to be an effective tool in reaching out to the next generation of leaders. As Secretary Powell said in his August 2001 Statement on International Education Week, "I can think of no more valuable asset to our country than the friendship of future world leaders who have been educated here."

One of the clear lessons of September 11 is that our government needs to do more to ensure that future generations in the Islamic world understand more about American values and culture. A recent Gallup poll in nine predominantly Muslim countries revealed strong anti-American attitudes. Nearly 1.5 billion people live in the Islamic world, and if we ignore these sentiments, we do so at our own peril. If we try to address the problem directly, by teaching American values to students from the Islamic world, we have a chance, in the long run, of changing negative attitudes. It's a long process, which September 11 has taught us we must begin now.

The State Department currently manages outstanding international student educational and cultural exchange programs that have helped foster mutual respect and understanding in many countries worldwide. These programs, which enable approximately 5,000 Americans to travel abroad and 20,000 foreign visitors to travel to the United States annually to study, teach, engage in people-to-people programs, have been enormously successful in promoting American values and cultural tolerance.

Unfortunately, visitors and students from the Islamic world are significantly underrepresented in many of these programs. Individuals in the Islamic world represent approximately 25 percent of the world's 6.2 billion people. However, in fiscal year 2000, less than 10 percent of the participants in State Department cultural and educational exchange programs were from the Islamic countries covered under our legislation, and less than 12 percent of the budget was spent on these countries. Additionally, according to the State Department's Bureau of Educational and Cultural Affairs, direct appropriated funding for exchanges has fallen by almost a third since 1993 which adjusted for inflation.

The additional $75 million our legislation authorizes for existing programs to be expanded in the Islamic world is essential to our nation's objective of promoting greater understanding of American values and ideals. Existing programs provide the essential building blocks our nation needs for an expanded and sustained effort to reach more broadly into these societies, to foster mutual respect, and to counter the ignorance and hatred that can lead to acts of terrorism.

In October of last year, President Bush spoke eloquently about the need to reach out in friendship to children and the Islamic world. In a speech to students at Thurgood Marshall Extended Elementary School, the President said that America is "determined to build ties of trust and friendship with people all around the world, particularly with children and people in the Islamic world.

To facilitate the President's goal of reaching children, our legislation would create a new program for high school students from the United States. No Federal program currently exists to facilitate such student exchanges with ever-increasing numbers of youth in the Islamic world.

There are many benefits to reaching out to students while they are young and open-minded to enhance mutual cultural understanding and tolerance. Today's high school students are tomorrow's leaders, and we need to begin working with them now to inform their attitudes about our country.

In a January 20, 2002 op-ed in the Washington Post, a former Fulbright scholarship recipient from Egypt expressed concern that his university in Egypt was and continues to be fertile ground for recruiters from terrorist or extremist organizations. Our challenge is to provide young students with the opportunity to learn about America, participate in all aspects of American family life, and understand our values before they reach that stage.

The high school student exchange program authorized in our legislation is modeled on the State Department's highly successful Future Leaders Exchange Program, FLEX, which brings approximately 1,000 students ages 15–17 from the Newly Independent States to the United States each year to attend an American high school for a year and live with an American family.

The FLEX program has been extremely effective in shaping attitudes among the students selected to participate from the Newly Independent States. A 1998 U.S. government study, which compared Russian FLEX alumni with other Russian youth of the same age, indicated that the FLEX alumni are more open to and accepting of Western values and democratic ideals. They are more likely to want to become leaders in and to make a contribution to their society. They tend to be more optimistic about the future of their country, especially its evolution to a more democratic, rule-of-law society, than other Russian youths.

Importantly, the FLEX program has been successful in the six predominantly Islamic countries from the Newly Independent States, Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan. More than 1,500 students from those Muslim countries have studied and lived in the United States since the program began. FLEX alumni in Azerbaijan and Turkmenistan are teaching English in their home countries, and alumni in Kyrgyzstan and Tajikistan have been involved in activities to develop democratic practices. Given the track record in these countries, there is every reason to believe that a high school student exchange program would succeed throughout the Islamic world.

Like the existing student exchange program for the Newly Independent States, our legislation requires participating students in high school exchanges from the Islamic world to be selected competitively and in a manner that ensures geographic, gender, and socio-economic diversity. To quality, students must be tested extensively and interviewed under State Department guidelines. As with the FLEX program, the State Department will work with experienced American non-governmental organizations to recruit, select, and place students and will remain in close contact with the public high school, American host family, and American non-governmental organizations while the students are in the United States.

Importantly, all students and visitors participating in programs authorized in this legislation must be admissible under all immigration laws and procedures. Furthermore, legislation recently passed by the Senate would improve our ability to screen foreign students by requiring increased communication among the State Department, the INS, and the schools enrolling foreign students and closing gaps in the existing foreign student monitoring program.

Our legislation has been endorsed by the Alliance for International Education and Cultural Exchange, AMIDEAST, AFS, the Academy for Educational Development, the American Councils for International Education, the American Institute for Foreign Study, the Institute of International Education, the National Council for International Visitors, Sister Cities International, World Learning, and World Study Group.

About the Cultural Bridges Act, the Director of the Alliance for International Educational and Cultural Exchange, a coalition of 65 organizations with chapters in all 50 states, former Ambassador Kenton Keith, wrote: "Winning the war on terrorism will demand more than just our military prowess. It will require us to engage the peoples of the Islamic world about our society and values if we are to forge the mutual understanding and respect that will be the basis of peaceful productive relationships. The exchanges authorized in your bill are the most cost-effective way to encourage the positive personal and institutional relationships that will enhance our long-term national security." I ask unanimous consent that copies of this and other endorsement letters be included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at the end of my statement along with the text of the legislation.

America must respond to the terrorist threat on many levels. We need to ensure that our defenses are strong, our borders are secure, and our relationships with allies are vibrant. We also need to do more in the area of public diplomacy.

It is clearly in America's national security interest to promote more people-to-people contacts throughout the Muslim world. Indeed, in a May 3rd speech to the World Affairs Council in California, Deputy Secretary of Defense Paul Wolfowitz spoke about the need to reach out and strengthen voices of moderation in the Islamic world and to bridge the "dangerous gap" between the West and the Muslim world. He said America must "begin now . . . the gap is wide and there is no time for delay."

After September 11, many of the Muslim countries condemned those acts and pledged to help the United States fight terrorism. As we have seen in Afghanistan, Pakistan, and elsewhere in the Muslim world, some individuals and factions within a country can support terrorists and terrorist organizations, while others seek to resolve issues peacefully. America must reach out in friendship to all individuals in the Islamic world who share our worldview.

The Koran says, "O Mankind! We created you from a single pair of a male and a female, and made you into nations and tribes, that ye may know each other." These words speak eloquently of the need for this legislation. Building bridges of understanding and tolerance across cultures will help ensure that Americans and people of the Islamic world will truly understand and know each other. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2505

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Cultural Bridges Act of 2002".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

Congress makes the following findings:

(1) Educating international students is an important way to impart cross-cultural understanding and create goodwill for the United States throughout the world.

(2) Students from the Islamic world are significantly underrepresented among the approximately 500,000 international students who study in the United States annually.

(3) The volume of professional and cultural exchanges between the United States and the Islamic world is extremely low compared to other regions, and these exchanges have proven extremely effective worldwide in building productive people-to-people ties.

(4) The Federally-funded Future Leaders Exchange Program for high school students from the former Soviet Union, administered by the Department of State, has demonstrated the positive impact of reaching out to international students at the secondary school level, introducing them to American culture, and strengthening their commitment to democratic values and ideals.

(5) A critical element in the war against terrorism will be increasing mutual understanding and respect between the peoples of the United States and peoples around the world, particularly those of the Islamic faith.

Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senators KENNEDY, CHAFEE, LEAHY, HAGEL, GORDON SMITH, COCHRAN, BROWNBACK, and JEFFORDS in introducing the Cultural Bridges Act of 2002. Put simply, our bill authorizes funding for international student exchange programs between the United States and countries of the Islamic world.

The bill authorizes $20 million to establish a secondary school level student exchange program that would bring students from the Islamic world to America in order to foster greater understanding and tolerance. It also authorizes an additional $75 million to existing student and foreign-exchange programs such as the Congress-Bundestag Program, Fulbright Scholarships, etc. The purpose is to foster mutual respect between our peoples and a greater understanding of the differences and similarities between the cultures.

One of the lessons learned in recent months is that the United States needs to create more effective tools of public diplomacy. The most striking example of this was a December 2000–January 2001 Gallup Poll in nine predominantly Muslim states that revealed very strong anti-American attitudes in a majority of the countries. There are no more effective means to spread American values and influence and to create goodwill than international student exchanges. As a result, I have concluded it is in U.S. national security interests to create an exchange program focused on Asia, the Middle East, and North Africa.

Last year only 10 percent of participants in various State Department student and cultural exchange programs came from Islamic countries outside the former Soviet Union. Our new program will bring students aged 15 to 17 to attend high school and live with an American family for a year. Recruitment and selection of participants will be conducted on a competitive basis designed to ensure geographic, gender, and socio-economic diversity.

The legislation is based on the successful Future Leaders Exchange Program, FLEX, for high school students in the former Soviet Union. The new exchange program with Islamic states would be administered by the Department of State and will utilize similar guidelines and regulations established for the FLEX Program and utilize organizations experienced in such exchanges. A study of Russian FLEX alumni concluded that they are more open to and accepting of Western values, democratic ideals and foreign interaction than other students of the same age.

In addition to the importance of increasing understanding between the United States and Islamic countries, we must also appreciate and address the continuing threat of terrorism. Our bill requires all students and visitors participating in programs authorized in this legislation to comply with the immigration procedures in the USA PATRIOT Act. Students will travel to the United States under J-visas.

I am pleased our legislation has garnered the support of so many non-governmental organizations involved in the implementation and management of student and cultural exchanges. As the Alliance for International Educational and Cultural Exchange wrote in their letter of April 2: "Winning the war on terrorism will demand more than just military prowess. It will require us to engage the peoples of the Islamic world about our society and values if we are to forge the mutual understanding and respect that will be the basis of peaceful, productive relationships. As September 11 and its aftermath makes clear, our public diplomacy has fallen short." The Alliance concludes by saying that the ". . . legislation is the right bill at the right time."

In addition to the Alliance, we have also received letters of support from: the AFS Intercultural Programs USA, the Academy for Educational Development, the American Councils for International Education, the American Institute for Foreign Study, the Institute of International Education, the National Council for International Visitors, Sister Cities International, World Learning, the World Study Group, and the America-Mideast Educational and Training Services.

I understand the administration has reviewed our legislation and indicated that they would support its passage, pending the allocation of necessary resources. I am hopeful that my colleagues will join Senator KENNEDY, our cosponsors and I in ensuring swift passage of this timely and important bill.

I ask unanimous consent that letters of support be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICA-MIDEAST EDUCATIONAL AND TRAINING SERVICES, INC.,
Washington, DC, April 4, 2002.

Hon. EDWARD M. KENNEDY, RICHARD LUGAR, AND LINCOLN CHAFEE.

DEAR SENATORS KENNEDY, LUGAR, AND CHAFEE: AMIDEAST is the largest American NGO promoting educational and cultural exchanges between the United States and the Arab world, where we have worked for over 50 years to strengthen mutual understanding and cooperation between Arabs and Americans. I am writing today to thank you for introducing the Cultural Bridges Act of 2002.

The Middle East is experiencing its most severe crisis since 1948. The chasm of misunderstanding between Arabs and Americans has never been wider. As I write to you today, demonstrations are taking place on high school and university campuses throughout the Middle East and North Africa denouncing what they perceive to be America's unfair support for Israeli's actions in the Occupied Territories. To win the war on terrorism, we need to find new ways to reach the youth of the Arab world, to quell their hostility towards us, and to engage them in constructive dialogue.

The Cultural Bridges Act of 2002 will afford us that opportunity. It will promote educational exchanges between the United States and the Islamic world, enabling Muslim youth to learn about our society and values first-hand and then serving as ambassadors of peace upon their return home, while affording American students first-hand experience abroad providing them with valuable insight and understanding about the Arab and Islamic worlds.

Your legislation is important and timely. We thank you for championing this bold initiative.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM A. RUGH,
U.S. Ambassador (retired),
President and CEO.

ALLIANCE FOR INTERNATIONAL EDUCATIONAL AND CULTURAL EXCHANGE,
Washington, DC, April 2, 2002.

Hon. EDWARD M. KENNEDY, RICHARD LUGAR, AND LINCOLN CHAFEE,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATORS KENNEDY, LUGAR, AND CHAFEE: On behalf of the 65 member NGOs of the Alliance for International Educational and Cultural Exchange, I write to thank you for your leadership in introducing the Cultural Bridges Act of 2002.

Winning the war on terrorism will demand more than just our military prowess. It will require us to engage the peoples of the Islamic world about our society and values if we are to forge the mutual understanding and respect that will be the basis of peaceful, productive relationships. As September 11 and its aftermath make clear, our public diplomacy has fallen short.

Building productive ties will require a sustained and serious commitment that reaches well beyond our current efforts. The exchanges authorized in your bill are the most cost-effective way to encourage the positive personal and institutional relationships that will enhance our long-term national security.

Congressional leadership will be crucial to this endeavor. Student and exchange flows from the Muslim world are among the lowest of any region, and significant new resources will be required to jump-start this effort. Moreover, a clear federal commitment will leverage private sector support from universities, schools, businesses, and communities across the U.S. This initiative will engage the American people directly in the conduct of the highest priority foreign policy.

Your legislation is the right bill at the right time. You have the gratitude and support of members of the exchange community throughout the United States.

Sincerely,

KENTON W. KEITH,
U.S. Ambassador (retired),
Chair, Board of Directors.

AFS-USA, INC.,
New York, NY, April 1, 2002.

Hon. EDWARD M. KENNEDY, RICHARD LUGAR, and LINCOLN CHAFEE,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATORS KENNEDY, LUGAR, AND CHAFEE: I am writing on behalf of our staff, volunteers, and board members located in all 50 States to express our pleasure and thanks for initiating the cultural Bridges Act of 2002.

AFS is the oldest, largest, and most diverse high school exchange program in the United States and in the world. We understand and appreciate the leadership you have demonstrated in sponsoring this bill. Public diplomacy in the Islamic world requires the focus and funding contained in your bill. Our 54 years of experience in the field of exchange tells us that a serious commitment, sustained over a number of years, will be needed to defeat terrorism at its roots by increasing understanding and tolerance among people of different countries, beliefs and values. AFS exchanged students from Germany and Japan with the U.S. almost immediately after World War II. Today those countries are our allies. Democratic principles, respect for others, and individual freedom are our values, and they can be powerful when seen through daily interaction with our families and students.

You are doing the right thing. We stand ready to support you in any way we can.

Thank you for your pursuit of peace and freedom.

Sincerely,

ALEX J. PLINIO,
President.

ACADEMY FOR EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT,
Washington, DC, April 2, 2002.

Hon. EDWARD M. KENNEDY, RICHARD LUGAR, and LINCOLN CHAFEE,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATORS KENNEDY, LUGAR AND CHAFEE: On behalf of the Academy for Educational Development, a non-profit organization serving people in more than 160 countries, I want to thank you for your leadership in introducing the Cultural Bridges Act of 2002.

International exchange programs are a critical component of the war on terrorism. Exchange programs enhance mutual understanding and build long-term bridges with individuals in other countries. Expanding the flow of people, ideas and information will promote greater understanding of the United States and will advance our foreign policy objectives.

The International Visitor Program has been particularly effective at reaching future foreign leaders and at advancing key foreign policy objectives. For example, a recent leadership development program brought student leaders from the Middle East and North Africa for exchanges with student leaders across the United States. Another program on the role of religion in the United States brought administrators from religious educational institutions, or "madrassahs," in Pakistan to meet with civic and religious leaders in several cities. Programs such as these that target key issues and leaders should be significantly expanded in the Islamic world.

Although the world's attention has been focused on the Muslim world, exchange programs from countries with large Islamic populations are underrepresented in U.S. government-sponsored exchange programs. Your bill will significantly enhance the capacity to reach out to individuals in these countries through people-to-people exchanges that are among our best tools of diplomacy.

We thank you for your leadership, vision and commitment in introducing this critical piece of legislation.

Sincerely,

STEPHEN F. MOSELEY,
President and Chief Executive Officer.

AMERICAN COUNCILS
FOR INTERNATIONAL EDUCATION,
Washington, DC, April 2, 2002.
Hon. EDWARD M. KENNEDY, RICHARD LUGAR, and LINCOLN CHAFEE,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATORS KENNEDY, LUGAR, and CHAFEE: I write to commend you for your leadership in introducing the Cultural Bridges Act of 2002, a legislative initiative designed to engage the diverse Islamic populations around the world through international exchange programs. I particularly want to thank you for focusing on high school exchanges as a highly effective mechanism for introducing the United States to this audience, and them to our fellow Americans.

While our country's public diplomacy efforts—which include exchange programs—have earned us many friends in parts of the world, the dramatic events of September 11th and our examination of our standing with key populations in the Islamic world since those terrorist attacks have revealed that we have neglected a critical world population stretching from West Africa to Southeast Asia. This arc crosses the Arab Middle East, through Southeastern Europe and Central Asia to Indochina; approximately 1.4 billion people populate the countries along this arc. Your initiative would make it our national policy to reach out to the peoples of these countries to build mutual understanding.

The Cultural Bridges Act of 2002 would capitalize on our nation's capacity to educate and inform by bringing individuals to the United States to learn about our culture, language, and aspirations—all while studying in school, mastering their chosen profession, or doing research. It provides a highly effective (and low cost) way to positively influence foreign populations through citizen diplomacy, something we've done well with post-war Europe and Japan, Latin America, and most recently with the countries of the former Warsaw Pact.

My own organization has utilized academic and youth exchanges for more than 25 years with the former Soviet Union. Among our many successes in fostering understanding of the United States in that region, some of the most impressive results result from exchange programs involving youth, like the Future Leaders Exchange Program, and secondary school teachers, like the Excellence in Teaching Awards Exchange Program—both funded through an earlier congressional initiative, the FREEDOM Support Act. The Cultural Bridges Act that you are introducing in the Senate would facilitate similar successes in the Islamic World.

The American Councils has experience with working in the Muslim communities of the NIS—communities that exist throughout the 12 countries of the old Soviet Union. Some of the most dynamic needs for expanded exchange opportunities in the NIS are apparent in the predominately Islamic countries of Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan—countries that are critical to addressing our urgent security concerns in Central Asia and all of which would be eligible to benefit from your legislation.

Your exchanges initiative is both an effective bulwark against ignorance of the United States and a proactive measure for securing the peace we hope to achieve through our current military campaign. I applaud your leadership in introducing this bill, and look forward to its enactment.

Sincerely,

DAN E. DAVIDSON,
President.

U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATORS: As a member of the Alliance for International Educational and Cultural Exchange, I write to thank you for your leadership in introducing the Cultural Bridges Act of 2002.

Winning the war on terrorism will demand more than just our military prowess. It will require us to engage the peoples of the Islamic world about our society and values if we are to forge the mutual understanding and respect that will be the basic of peaceful, productive relationships. As September 11 and its aftermath make clear, our public diplomacy has fallen short.

Building productive ties will require a sustained and serious commitment that reaches well beyond our current efforts. The exchanges authorized in your bill are the most cost-effective way to encourage the positive personal and institutional relationships that will enhance our long-term national security.

Congressional leadership will be crucial to this endeavor. Student and exchange flows from the Muslim world are among the lowest of any region, and significant new resources will be required to jump-start this effort. Moreover, a clear federal commitment will leverage private sector support from universities, schools, businesses, and communities across the U.S. This initiative will engage the American people directly in the conduct of the highest priority foreign policy.

Your legislation is the right bill at the right time. You have the gratitude and support of members of the exchange community throughout the United States.

INSTITUTE OF INTERNATIONAL EDUCATION,
New York, NY April 2, 2002.
Hon. EDWARD M. KENNEDY, RICHARD G. LUGAR, and LINCOLN D. CHAFEE,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATORS: On behalf of the Institute of International Education, including our Trustees and volunteers across the country, please accept IIE's thanks and appreciation for the leadership you are showing by introducing the Cultural Bridges Act of 2002. Your initiative could not be more relevant and timely.

As always, the leadership of Congress in international educational exchange is critical. Now, in vulnerable areas of the world where peace, understanding and progress through education are vitally needed to insure that terrorism and intolerance are eliminated, your legislation addresses key areas where we can work to build shared values.

Exchanges of high school and college students, graduate students and young professionals, as well as others, who can help create the climate we need where progressive democratic developments flourish are sorely needed in Africa, the Near East, Central and South Asia, and Southeast Asia. The focus of your Cultural Bridges Act of 2002 on members of the Organization of Islamic Conference includes virtually every nation we need to reach if we are serious about making people to people diplomacy work for youth. As you know, the Institute has always regarded the Mutual Educational and Cultural Exchanges Act of 1961 as one of the most important of all this nation's foreign policy documents. By directing the Department of State to establish new initiatives through the authority of the 1961 Act you will assure that the philanthropic and higher education sectors not only support your efforts but help you leverage government resources for important common purposes.

Please let me know if there is anything the Institute can do to assist you in this critically important endeavor at a time of great national need.

Sincerely yours,

——— ———

NATIONAL COUNCIL FOR INTERNATIONAL VISITORS,
Washington, DC, April 2, 2002.
Hon. EDWARD M. KENNEDY, RICHARD LUGAR, and LINCOLN CHAFEE,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATORS KENNEDY, LUGAR, AND CHAFEE: On behalf of the Board and members of the National Council for International Visitors (NCIV), we thank you for your initiative in introducing the Cultural Bridges Act of 2002. NCIV members—nonprofit program agencies and 95 community organizations across the United States—organize professional programs, home visits, and cultural activities for participants in the State Department's International Visitor Program and other exchanges. More than 80,000 volunteers are involved in NCIV member activities each year, including WorldBoston, International Center of Indianapolis, and the World Affairs Council of Rhode Island.

NCIV members promote citizen diplomacy—the idea that the individual citizen has the right, even the responsibility, to help shape U.S. foreign relations "one handshake at a time" through exchanges. We are grateful for your leadership in introducing this legislation that will make more of these handshakes possible with participants from underserved areas of the world.

Sincerely,

ALAN KUMAMOTO,
Chair, Board of Directors.

SHERRY L. MUELLER,
President.

SISTER CITIES INTERNATIONAL,
Washington, DC, April 1, 2002.
Hon. EDWARD M. KENNEDY, RICHARD LUGAR, and LINCOLN CHAFEE,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATORS KENNEDY, LUGAR, AND CHAFEE: On behalf of Sister Cities International and the 700 U.S. cities joined in cooperative sister city partnerships with 1,500 international cities in 121 countries, I applaud your leadership in introducing the Cultural Bridges Act of 2002. The Cultural Bridges Act of 2002 will be a vital tool in the conduct of U.S. foreign policy and public diplomacy in response to new challenges facing the United States.

The need for increased international understanding and cooperation has never been more imperative than in the aftermath of September 11. International education and exchange programs are critical elements in advancing U.S. foreign policy and national security, as they build understanding and cooperation between Americans and future foreign leaders. Nearly 150 present and past foreign heads of state made their first visits to the United States on exchange programs. This powerful tool for building productive, positive relationships has served the United States extraordinarily well over the years, and has included visits from world leaders such as Anwar Sadat and Indira Gandhi, French Premier Lionel Jospin and British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

Perhaps most importantly, the Cultural Bridges Act boldly leads the way for the federal government to encourage sustainable, cooperative relationships between the United States and the Islamic world. In the fight against terrorism and efforts to improve our national security, there can be no doubt that fostering international exchanges will help diminish negative stereotypes and build an environment of mutual understanding and respect for differences. Furthermore, the Cultural Bridges Act will help foster citizen diplomacy initiatives that will promote the involvement of local citizens in international engagement. Now more than ever, the federal government must invest in capacity building at the community level to promote citizen diplomacy, particularly with regard to the Islamic world. As we know, resources allotted for these activities are drastically insufficient in the current climate, and we hope the introduction of the Cultural Bridges Act will move our nation in the right direction of enhanced cooperation.

Thank you for your leadership on this pressing issue.

Sincerely,

TIM HONEY,
Executive Director.

WORLD LEARNING,
Washington, DC, April 1, 2002.
Hon. EDWARD M. KENNEDY, RICHARD LUGAR, and LINCOLN CHAFEE,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATORS KENNEDY, LUGAR, AND CHAFEE: Thank you for your leadership in introducing the Cultural Bridges Act of 2002. Enactment of this legislation will make possible increase opportunities to bring current and future leaders from the Islamic world to the United States and to send Americans to Muslim counties to teach and study.

Expanded opportunities for citizen exchange between the United States and the Islamic world will help to engender increased respect, understanding and trust between our peoples. building this mutual understanding will enhance our national security by broadening the range of productive interactions between the United States and Muslim countries.

Currently, student and other exchange flows with Muslim countries are lower than with regions of the world. The programs which the Cultural Bridges Act authorizes would provide for significant increases at this crucial time for our nation. Thank you again for your leadership in working to strengthen these important programs.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT CHASE,
Vice President.

WORLD STUDY GROUP,
San Francisco, CA, April 2, 2002.
Hon. EDWARD M. KENNEDY, RICHARD LUGAR, and LINCOLN CHAFEE,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATORS KENNEDY, LUGAR, AND CHAFEE: On behalf of the World Study Group, I write to thank you for your leadership in introducing the Cultural Bridges Act of 2002. The World Study Group and its affiliated J-1 visa programs are dedicated to increasing understanding and trust between people through international cultural exchange.

Building productive ties with Muslim world will require a sustained and serious commitment that reaches well beyond our current efforts. The exchanges authorized in your bill are the most cost-effective way to encourage the positive personal and institutional relationships that will enhance our long-term national security goals. Breaking down misunderstanding requires that our peoples know each other better.

Congressional leadership will be crucial to this endeavor. Student exchanges from the Muslim world are among the lowest of any region, and significant new resources will be required to jump start this effort. Moreover, a clear federal commitment will leverage private sector support and will immediately engage the American people directly in the conduct of this high priority foreign policy initiative.

Your legislation is the right bill at the right time. On behalf of AYUSA, AuPairCare, and Intrax Inc., we thank you. You have the gratitude and support of our staff and field representatives throughout the United States.

Sincerely,

JOHN WILHELM,
President.

"(C) before the termination date (if any) determined pursuant to section 231(e).

"(2) Employment required.—

"(A) In general.—The adversely affected worker had, in the 52-week period ending with the week in which the total or partial separation occurred, at least 26 weeks of employment at wages of $30 or more a week with a single firm or subdivision of a firm.

"(B) Unavailability of data.—If data with respect to weeks of employment with a firm are not available, the worker had equivalent amounts of employment computed under regulations prescribed by the Secretary.

"(C) Week of employment.—For the purposes of this paragraph any week shall be treated as a week of employment at wages of $30 or more, if an adversely affected worker—

"(ii) In the case of weeks described in clause (ii) or (iv) of subparagraph (C), not more than 26 weeks may be treated as weeks of employment under subparagraph (C).

"(3) Unemployment compensation.—The adversely affected worker meets all of the following requirements:

"(A) Entitlement to unemployment insurance.—The worker was entitled to (or would be entitled to if the worker applied for) unemployment insurance for a week within the benefit period—

"(i) in which total or partial separation took place; or

"(ii) which began (or would have begun) by reason of the filing of a claim for unemployment insurance by the worker after total or partial separation.

"(B) Exhaustion of unemployment insurance.—The worker has exhausted all rights to any regular State unemployment insurance to which the worker was entitled (or would be entitled if the worker had applied for any regular State unemployment insurance).

"(C) No unexpired waiting period.—The worker does not have an unexpired waiting period applicable to the worker for any unemployment insurance.

"(4) Extended unemployment compensation.—The adversely affected worker, with respect to a week of unemployment, would not be disqualified for extended compensation payable under the Federal-State Extended Unemployment Compensation Act of 1970 (26 U.S.C. 3304 note) by reason of the work acceptance and job search requirements in section 202(a)(3) of that Act.

"(B) 8 weeks.—The worker enrolled not later than the last day of the 8th week after the week in which the Secretary issues a certification covering the worker.

"(C) Extenuating circumstances.—Notwithstanding subparagraphs (A) and (B), the adversely affected worker is eligible for trade adjustment assistance if the worker enrolled not later than 45 days after the later of the dates specified in subparagraph (A) or (B), and the Secretary determines there are extenuating circumstances that justify an extension in the enrollment period.

"(b) Failure To Participate in Training.—

"(1) In general.—Until the adversely affected worker begins or resumes participation in a training program approved under section 240(a), no trade adjustment allowance may be paid under subsection (a) to an adversely affected worker for any week or any succeeding week in which—

"(A) the Secretary determines that—

"(i) the adversely affected worker—

"(I) has failed to begin participation in a training program the enrollment in which meets the requirement of subsection (a)(5); or

"(II) has ceased to participate in such a training program before completing the training program; and

"(ii) there is no justifiable cause for the failure or cessation; or

"(B) the waiver issued to that worker under subsection (c)(1) is revoked under subsection (c)(2).

"(c) Waivers of Training Requirements.—

"(1) Issuance of waivers.—The Secretary may issue a written statement to an adversely affected worker waiving the requirement to be enrolled in training described in subsection (a) if the Secretary determines that the training requirement is not feasible or appropriate for the worker, because of 1 or more of the following reasons:

"(A) Recall.—The worker has been notified that the worker will be recalled by the firm from which the separation occurred.

"(B) Marketable skills.—The worker possesses marketable skills for suitable employment (as determined pursuant to an assessment of the worker, which may include the profiling system under section 303(j) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 503(j)), carried out in accordance with guidelines issued by the Secretary) and there is a reasonable expectation of employment at equivalent wages in the foreseeable future.

"(C) Retirement.—The worker is within 2 years of meeting all requirements for entitlement to either—

"(i) old-age insurance benefits under title II of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 401 et seq.) (except for application therefore); or

"(ii) a private pension sponsored by an employer or labor organization.

"(D) Health.—The worker is unable to participate in training due to the health of the worker, except that a waiver under this subparagraph shall not be construed to exempt a worker from requirements relating to the availability for work, active search for work, or refusal to accept work under Federal or State unemployment compensation laws.

"(E) Enrollment unavailable.—The first available enrollment date for the approved training of the worker is within 60 days after the date of the determination made under this paragraph, or, if later, there are extenuating circumstances for the delay in enrollment, as determined pursuant to guidelines issued by the Secretary.

"(F) Training not available.—Training approved by the Secretary is not reasonably available to the worker from either governmental agencies or private sources (which may include area vocational education schools, as defined in section 3 of the Carl D. Perkins Vocational and Technical Education Act of 1998 (20 U.S.C. 2302), and employers), no training that is suitable for the worker is available at a reasonable cost, or no training funds are available.

"(G) Other.—The Secretary may, at his discretion, issue a waiver if the Secretary determines that a worker has set forth in writing reasons other than those provided for in subparagraphs (A) through (F) justifying the grant of such waiver.

"(2) Duration of waivers.—

"(A) In general.—A waiver issued under paragraph (1) shall be effective for not more than 6 months after the date on which the waiver is issued, unless the Secretary determines otherwise.

"(B) REVOCATION.—The Secretary shall revoke a waiver issued under paragraph (1) if the Secretary determines that the basis of a waiver is no longer applicable to the worker.

"SEC. 236. WEEKLY AMOUNTS.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Subject to subsections (b) and (c), the trade adjustment allowance payable to an adversely affected worker for a week of total unemployment shall be an amount equal to the most recent weekly benefit amount of the unemployment insurance payable to the worker for a week of total unemployment preceding the worker's first exhaustion of unemployment insurance (as determined for purposes of section 235(a)(3)(B)) reduced (but not below zero) by—

"(1) any training allowance deductible under subsection (c); and

"(2) any income that is deductible from unemployment insurance under the disqualifying income provisions of the applicable State law or Federal unemployment insurance law.

"(b) ADJUSTMENT FOR WORKERS RECEIVING TRAINING.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Any adversely affected worker who is entitled to a trade adjustment allowance and who is receiving training approved by the Secretary, shall receive for each week in which the worker is undergoing that training, a trade adjustment allowance in an amount (computed for such week) equal to the greater of—

"(A) the amount computed under subsection (a); or

"(B) the amount of any weekly allowance for that training to which the worker would be entitled under any other Federal law for the training of workers, if the worker applied for that allowance.

"(2) ALLOWANCE PAID IN LIEU OF.—Any trade adjustment allowance calculated under paragraph (1) shall be paid in lieu of any training allowance to which the worker would be entitled under any other Federal law.

"(3) COORDINATION WITH UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE.—Any week in which a worker undergoing training approved by the Secretary receives payments from unemployment insurance shall be subtracted from the total number of weeks for which a worker may receive trade adjustment allowance under this chapter.

"(c) ADJUSTMENT FOR WORKERS RECEIVING ALLOWANCES UNDER OTHER FEDERAL LAW.—

"(1) REDUCTION IN WEEKS FOR WHICH ALLOWANCE WILL BE PAID.—If a training allowance under any Federal law (other than this Act) is paid to an adversely affected worker for any week of unemployment with respect to which the worker would be entitled (determined without regard to any disqualification under section 235(b)) to a trade adjustment allowance if the worker applied for that allowance, each week of unemployment shall be deducted from the total number of weeks of trade adjustment allowance otherwise payable to that worker under section 235(a) when the worker applies for a trade adjustment allowance and is determined to be entitled to the allowance.

"(2) PAYMENT OF DIFFERENCE.—If the training allowance paid to a worker for any week of unemployment is less than the amount of the trade adjustment allowance to which the worker would be entitled if the worker applied for the trade adjustment allowance, the worker shall receive, when the worker applies for a trade adjustment allowance and is determined to be entitled to the allowance, a trade adjustment allowance for that week equal to the difference between the training allowance and the trade adjustment allowance computed under subsection (b).

"SEC. 237. LIMITATIONS ON TRADE ADJUSTMENT ALLOWANCES.

"(a) AMOUNT PAYABLE.—The maximum amount of trade adjustment allowance payable to an adversely affected worker, with respect to the period covered by any certification, shall be the amount that is the product of 104 multiplied by the trade adjustment allowance payable to the worker for a week of total unemployment (as determined under section 236) reduced by the total sum of the regular State unemployment insurance to which the worker was entitled (or would have been entitled if the worker had applied for unemployment insurance) in the worker's first benefit period described in section 235(a)(3)(A).

"(b) DURATION OF PAYMENTS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in paragraph (2), a trade adjustment allowance shall not be paid for any week occurring after the close of the 104-week period that begins with the first week following the week in which the adversely affected worker was most recently totally separated—

"(A) within the period that is described in section 235(a)(1); and

"(B) with respect to which the worker meets the requirements of section 235(a)(2).

"(2) SPECIAL RULES.—

"(A) BREAK IN TRAINING.—For purposes of this chapter, a worker shall be treated as participating in a training program approved by the Secretary under section 240(a) during any week that is part of a break in a training that does not exceed 30 days if—

"(2) EXTENDED BENEFITS PERIOD.—For the purpose of this section the term 'extended benefit period' has the same meaning given that term in the Federal-State Extended Unemployment Compensation Act of 1970 (26 U.S.C. 3304 note).

"SEC. 238. APPLICATION OF STATE LAWS.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Except where inconsistent with the provisions of this chapter and subject to such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe, the availability and disqualification provisions of the State law under which an adversely affected worker is entitled to unemployment insurance (whether or not the worker has filed a claim for such insurance), or, if the worker is not so entitled to unemployment insurance, of the State in which the worker was totally or partially separated, shall apply to a worker that files an application for trade adjustment assistance.

"(b) DURATION OF APPLICABILITY.—The State law determined to be applicable with respect to a separation of an adversely affected worker shall remain applicable for purposes of subsection (a), with respect to a separation until the worker becomes entitled to unemployment insurance under another State law (whether or not the worker has filed a claim for that insurance).

"PART III—EMPLOYMENT SERVICES, TRAINING, AND OTHER ALLOWANCES

"SEC. 239. EMPLOYMENT SERVICES.

"The Secretary shall, in accordance with section 222 or 223, as applicable, make every reasonable effort to secure for adversely affected workers covered by a certification under section 231, counseling, testing, placement, and other services provided for under any other Federal law.

"(E) any other training program that the Secretary determines is acceptable to meet the needs of an adversely affected worker.

In making the determination under subparagraph (E), the Secretary shall consult with interested parties.

"(2) TRAINING AGREEMENTS.—Before approving any training to which subsection (f)(1)(C) may apply, the Secretary may require that the adversely affected worker enter into an agreement with the Secretary under which the Secretary will not be required to pay under subsection (b) the portion of the costs of the training that the worker has reason to believe will be paid under the program, or by the source, described in clause (i) or (ii) of subsection (f)(1)(C).

"(3) LIMITATION ON APPROVALS.—The Secretary shall not approve a training program if all of the following apply:

"(A) PAYMENT BY PLAN.—Any portion of the costs of the training program are paid under any nongovernmental plan or program.

"(B) RIGHT TO OBTAIN.—The adversely affected worker has a right to obtain training or funds for training under that plan or program.

"(b) PAYMENT OF TRAINING COSTS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Upon approval of a training program under subsection (a), and subject to the limitations imposed by this section, an adversely affected worker covered by a certification issued under section 231 may be eligible to have payment of the costs of that training, including any costs of an approved training program incurred by a worker before a certification was issued under section 231, made on behalf of the worker by the Secretary directly or through a voucher system.

"(2) ON-THE-JOB TRAINING AND CUSTOMIZED TRAINING.—

"(A) PROVISION OF TRAINING ON THE JOB OR CUSTOMIZED TRAINING.—If the Secretary approves training under subsection (a), the Secretary shall, insofar as possible, provide or assure the provision of that training on the job or customized training, and any training on the job or customized training that is approved by the Secretary under subsection (a) shall include related education necessary for the acquisition of skills needed for a position within a particular occupation.

"(B) MONTHLY INSTALLMENTS.—If the Secretary approves payment of any on-the-job training or customized training under subsection (a), the Secretary shall pay the costs of that training in equal monthly installments.

"(C) LIMITATIONS.—The Secretary may pay the costs of on-the-job training or customized training only if—

"(i) no employed worker is displaced by the adversely affected worker (including partial displacement such as a reduction in the hours of nonovertime work, wages, or employment benefits);

"(ii) the training does not impair contracts for services or collective bargaining agreements;

"(iii) in the case of training that would affect a collective bargaining agreement, the written concurrence of the labor organization concerned has been obtained;

"(iv) no other individual is on layoff from the same, or any substantially equivalent, job for which the adversely affected worker is being trained;

"(v) the employer has not terminated the employment of any regular employee or otherwise reduced the workforce of the employer with the intention of filling the vacancy so created by hiring the adversely affected worker;

"(vi) the job for which the adversely affected worker is being trained is not being created in a promotional line that will infringe in any way upon the promotional opportunities of employed individuals;

"(vii) the training is not for the same occupation from which the worker was separated and with respect to which the worker's group was certified pursuant to section 231;

"(viii) the employer is provided reimbursement of not more than 50 percent of the wage rate of the participant, for the cost of providing the training and additional supervision related to the training;

"(c) CERTAIN WORKERS ELIGIBLE FOR TRAINING BENEFITS.—An adversely affected worker covered by a certification issued under section 231, who is not qualified to receive a trade adjustment allowance under section 235, may be eligible to have payment of the costs of training made under this section, if the worker enters a training program approved by the Secretary not later than 6 months after the date on which the certification that covers the worker is issued or the Secretary determines that one of the following applied:

"(1) Funding was not available at the time at which the adversely affected worker was required to enter training under paragraph (1).

"(2) The adversely affected worker was covered by a waiver issued under section 235(c).

"(d) EXHAUSTION OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE NOT REQUIRED.—The Secretary may approve training, and pay the costs thereof, for any adversely affected worker who is a member of a group certified under section 231 at any time after the date on which the group is certified, without regard to whether the worker has exhausted all rights to any unemployment insurance to which the worker is entitled.

"(e) SUPPLEMENTAL ASSISTANCE.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Subject to paragraphs (2) and (3), when training is provided under a training program approved by the Secretary under subsection (a) in facilities that are not within commuting distance of a worker's regular place of residence, the Secretary may authorize supplemental assistance to defray reasonable transportation and subsistence expenses for separate maintenance.

"(2) TRANSPORTATION EXPENSES.—The Secretary may not authorize payments for travel expenses exceeding the prevailing mileage rate authorized under the Federal travel regulations.

"(3) SUBSISTENCE EXPENSES.—The Secretary may not authorize payments for subsistence that exceed the lesser of—

"(B) an amount equal to 50 percent of the prevailing per diem allowance rate authorized under Federal travel regulations.

"(f) SPECIAL PROVISIONS; LIMITATIONS.—

"(1) LIMITATION ON MAKING PAYMENTS.—

"(A) DISALLOWANCE OF OTHER PAYMENT.—If the costs of training an adversely affected worker are paid by the Secretary under subsection (b), no other payment for those training costs may be made under any other provision of Federal law.

"(B) NO PAYMENT OF REIMBURSABLE COSTS.—No payment for the costs of approved training may be made under subsection (b) if those costs—

"(i) have already been paid under any other provision of Federal law; or

"(ii) are reimbursable under any other provision of Federal law and a portion of those costs has already been paid under that other provision of Federal law.

"(C) NO PAYMENT OF COSTS PAID ELSEWHERE.—The Secretary is not required to pay the costs of any training approved under subsection (a) to the extent that those costs are paid under any Federal or State program other than this chapter.

"(D) EXCEPTION.—The provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to, or take into account, any funds provided under any other provision of Federal law that are used for any purpose other than the direct payment of the costs incurred in training a particular adversely affected worker, even if the use of those funds has the effect of indirectly paying for or reducing any portion of the costs involved in training the adversely affected worker.

"(2) UNEMPLOYMENT ELIGIBILITY.—A worker may not be determined to be ineligible or disqualified for unemployment insurance or program benefits under this subchapter because the individual is in training approved under subsection (a), because of leaving work which is not suitable employment to enter the training, or because of the application to any week in training of provisions of State law or Federal unemployment insurance law relating to availability for work, active search for work, or refusal to accept work.

"(3) DEFINITION.—For purposes of this section the term 'suitable employment' means, with respect to a worker, work of a substantially equal or higher skill level than the worker's past adversely affected employment, and wages for such work at not less than 80 percent of the worker's average weekly wage.

(4) Secretary.—The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Agriculture, acting through the Agricultural Marketing Service.

(b) Notice of Country of Origin.—

(1) Requirement.—Except as provided in paragraph (3), a retailer of a covered commodity shall inform consumers, at the final point of sale of the covered commodity to consumers, of the country of origin of the covered commodity.

(2) United states country of origin.—A retailer of a covered commodity may designate the covered commodity as having a United States country of origin only if the covered commodity is exclusively harvested and processed in the United States, or in the case of farm-raised fish and shellfish, is hatched, raised, harvested, and processed in the United States.

(3) Exemption for food service establishments.—Paragraph (1) shall not apply to a covered commodity if the covered commodity is prepared or served in a food service establishment, and—

(A) offered for sale or sold at the food service establishment in normal retail quantities; or

(B) served to consumers at the food service establishment.

SEC. 1002. SUGAR POLICY.

(a) Findings.—Congress finds that—

(1) the tariff-rate quotas imposed on imports of sugar, syrups and sugar-containing products under chapters 17, 18, 19, and 21 of the Harmonized Tariff Schedule of the United States are an essential element of United States sugar policy;

(2) circumvention of the tariff-rate quotas will, if unchecked, make it impossible to achieve the objectives of United States sugar policy;

(3) the tariff-rate quotas have been circumvented frequently, defeating the purposes of United States sugar policy and causing disruption to the United States market for sweeteners, injury to domestic growers, refiners, and processors of sugar, and adversely affecting legitimate exporters of sugar to the United States;

(4) it is essential to United States sugar policy that the tariff-rate quotas be enforced and that deceptive practices be prevented, including the importation of products with no commercial use and failure to disclose all relevant information to the United States Customs Service; and

(5) unless action is taken to prevent circumvention, circumvention of the tariff-rate quotas will continue and will ultimately destroy United States sugar policy.

(b) Policy.—It is the policy of the United States to maintain the integrity of the tariff-rate quotas on sugars, syrups, and sugar-containing products by stopping circumvention as soon as it becomes apparent. It is also the policy of the United States that products not used to circumvent the tariff-rate quotas, such as molasses used for animal feed or for rum, not be affected by any action taken pursuant to this Act.

(c) Identification of Imports.—

(1) Identification.—Not later than 30 days after the date of enactment of this Act, and on a regular basis thereafter, the Secretary of Agriculture shall—

(A) identify imports of articles that are circumventing tariff-rate quotas on sugars, syrups, or sugar-containing products imposed under chapter 17, 18, 19, or 21 of the Harmonized Tariff Schedule of the United States; and

(B) report to the President the articles found to be circumventing the tariff-rate quotas.

(2) Action by President.—Upon receiving the report from the Secretary of Agriculture, the President shall, by proclamation, include any article identified by the Secretary in the appropriate tariff-rate quota provision of the Harmonized Tariff Schedule.

DIVISION B—BIPARTISAN TRADE PROMOTION AUTHORITY

TITLE XXI—TRADE PROMOTION AUTHORITY

SEC. 2101. SHORT TITLE; FINDINGS.

(a) Short Title.—This title may be cited as the "Bipartisan Trade Promotion Authority Act of 2002".

(b) Findings.—Congress makes the following findings:

(1) The expansion of international trade is vital to the national security of the United States. Trade is critical to the economic growth and strength of the United States and to its leadership in the world. Stable trading relationships promote security and prosperity. Trade agreements today serve the same purposes that security pacts played during the Cold War, binding nations together through a series of mutual rights and obligations. Leadership by the United States in international trade fosters open markets, democracy, and peace throughout the world.

(2) The national security of the United States depends on its economic security, which in turn is founded upon a vibrant and growing industrial base. Trade expansion has been the engine of economic growth. Trade agreements maximize opportunities for the critical sectors and building blocks of the economy of the United States, such as information technology, telecommunications and other leading technologies, basic industries, capital equipment, medical equipment, services, agriculture, environmental technology, and intellectual property. Trade will create new opportunities for the United States and preserve the unparalleled strength of the United States in economic, political, and military affairs. The United States, secured by expanding trade and economic opportunities, will meet the challenges of the twenty-first century.

(3) Support for continued trade expansion requires that dispute settlement procedures under international trade agreements not add to or diminish the rights and obligations provided in such agreements. Nevertheless, in several cases, dispute settlement panels and the WTO Appellate Body have added to obligations and diminished rights of the United States under WTO Agreements. In particular, dispute settlement panels and the Appellate Body have—

(A) given insufficient deference to the expertise and fact-finding of the Department of Commerce and the United States International Trade Commission;

(B) imposed an obligation concerning the casual relationship between increased imports into the United States and serious injury to domestic industry necessary to support a safeguard measure that is different from the obligation set forth in the applicable WTO Agreements;

(C) imposed an obligation concerning the exclusion from safeguards measures of products imported from countries party to a free trade agreement that is different from the obligation set forth in the applicable WTO Agreements;

(D) imposed obligations on the Department of Commerce with respect to the use of facts available in antidumping investigations that are different from the obligations set forth in the applicable WTO Agreements; and

(E) accorded insufficient deference to the Department of Commerce's methodology for adjusting countervailing duties following the privatization of a subsidized foreign producer.

SEC. 2102. TRADE NEGOTIATING OBJECTIVES.

(a) Overall Trade Negotiating Objectives.—The overall trade negotiating objectives of the United States for agreements subject to the provisions of section 2103 are—

(1) to obtain more open, equitable, and reciprocal market access;

(2) to obtain the reduction or elimination of barriers and distortions that are directly related to trade and that decrease market opportunities for United States exports or otherwise distort United States trade;

(3) to further strengthen the system of international trading disciplines and procedures, including dispute settlement;

(4) to foster economic growth, raise living standards, and promote full employment in the United States and to enhance the global economy;

(5) to ensure that trade and environmental policies are mutually supportive and to seek to protect and preserve the environment and enhance the international means of doing so, while optimizing the use of the world's resources;

(6) to promote respect for worker rights and the rights of children consistent with core labor standards of the International Labor Organization (as defined in section 2113(2)) and an understanding of the relationship between trade and worker rights;

(7) to seek provisions in trade agreements under which parties to those agreements strive to ensure that they do not weaken or reduce the protections afforded in domestic environmental and labor laws as an encouragement for trade; and

(8) to ensure that trade agreements afford small businesses equal access to international markets, equitable trade benefits, expanded export market opportunities, and provide for the reduction or elimination of trade barriers that disproportionately impact small business.

(b) Principal Trade Negotiating Objectives.—

(1) Trade barriers and distortions.—The principal negotiating objectives of the United States regarding trade barriers and other trade distortions are—

(A) to expand competitive market opportunities for United States exports and to obtain fairer and more open conditions of trade by reducing or eliminating tariff and nontariff barriers and policies and practices of foreign governments directly related to trade that decrease market opportunities for United States exports or otherwise distort United States trade; and

(B) to obtain reciprocal tariff and nontariff barrier elimination agreements, with particular attention to those tariff categories covered in section 111(b) of the Uruguay Round Agreements Act (19 U.S.C. 3521(b)).

(2) Trade in services.—The principal negotiating objective of the United States regarding trade in services is to reduce or eliminate barriers to international trade in services, including regulatory and other barriers that deny national treatment and market access or unreasonably restrict the establishment or operations of service suppliers.

(3) Foreign investment.—Recognizing that United States law on the whole provides a high level of protection for investment, consistent with or greater than the level required by international law, the principal negotiating objectives of the United States regarding foreign investment are to reduce or eliminate artificial or trade-distorting barriers to trade-related foreign investment, while ensuring that United States investors in the United States are not accorded lesser rights than foreign investors in the United States, and to secure for investors important rights comparable to those that would be available under United States legal principles and practice, by—

(A) reducing or eliminating exceptions to the principle of national treatment;

(B) freeing the transfer of funds relating to investments;

(C) reducing or eliminating performance requirements, forced technology transfers, and other unreasonable barriers to the establishment and operation of investments;

(D) seeking to establish standards for expropriation and compensation for expropriation, consistent with United States legal principles and practice;

(E) seeking to establish standards for fair and equitable treatment consistent with United States legal principles and practice, including the principle of due process;

(F) providing meaningful procedures for resolving investment disputes;

(G) seeking to improve mechanisms used to resolve disputes between an investor and a government through—

(i) mechanisms to eliminate frivolous claims and to deter the filing of frivolous claims;

(ii) procedures to ensure the efficient selection of arbitrators and the expeditious disposition of claims;

(iii) procedures to enhance opportunities for public input into the formulation of government positions; and

(iv) establishment of a single appellate body to review decisions in investor-to-government disputes and thereby provide coherence to the interpretations of investment provisions in trade agreements; and

(H) ensuring the fullest measure of transparency in the dispute settlement mechanism, to the extent consistent with the need to protect information that is classified or business confidential, by—

(i) ensuring that all requests for dispute settlement are promptly made public;

(ii) ensuring that—

(I) all proceedings, submissions, findings, and decisions are promptly made public;

(II) all hearings are open to the public; and

(iii) establishing a mechanism for acceptance of amicus curiae submissions from businesses, unions, and nongovernmental organizations.

(4) INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY.—The principal negotiating objectives of the United States regarding trade-related intellectual property are—

(A) to further promote adequate and effective protection of intellectual property rights, including through—

(i)(I) ensuring accelerated and full implementation of the Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights referred to in section 101(d)(15) of the Uruguay Round Agreements Act (19 U.S.C. 3511(d)(15), particularly with respect to meeting enforcement obligations under that agreement; and

(10) RECIPROCAL TRADE IN AGRICULTURE.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—The principal negotiating objective of the United States with respect to agriculture is to obtain competitive opportunities for United States exports of agricultural commodities in foreign markets substantially equivalent to the competitive opportunities afforded foreign exports in United States markets and to achieve fairer and more open conditions of trade in bulk, specialty crop, and value-added commodities by—

(ii) reducing tariffs to levels that are the same as or lower than those in the United States;

(xi) taking into account whether a party to the negotiations has failed to adhere to the provisions of already existing trade agreements with the United States or has circumvented obligations under those agreements;

(xii) taking into account whether a product is subject to market distortions by reason of a failure of a major producing country to adhere to the provisions of already existing trade agreements with the United States or by the circumvention by that country of its obligations under those agreements;

(xiii) otherwise ensuring that countries that accede to the World Trade Organization have made meaningful market liberalization commitments in agriculture;

(xiv) taking into account the impact that agreements covering agriculture to which the United States is a party, including the North American Free Trade Agreement, have on the United States agricultural industry;

(xv) maintaining bona fide food assistance programs and preserving United States market development and export credit programs; and

(xvi) strive to complete a general multilateral round in the World Trade Organization by January 1, 2005, and seek the broadest market access possible in multilateral, regional, and bilateral negotiations, recognizing the effect that simultaneous sets of negotiations may have on United States import-sensitive commodities (including those subject to tariff-rate quotas).

(B) Consultation

(i) BEFORE COMMENCING NEGOTIATIONS.—Before commencing negotiations with respect to agriculture, the United States Trade Representative, in consultation with the Congress, shall seek to develop a position on the treatment of seasonal and perishable agricultural products to be employed in the negotiations in order to develop an international consensus on the treatment of seasonal or perishable agricultural products in investigations relating to dumping and safeguards and in any other relevant area.

(ii) DURING NEGOTIATIONS.—During any negotiations on agricultural subsidies, the United States Trade Representative shall seek to establish the common base year for calculating the Aggregated Measurement of Support (as defined in the Agreement on Agriculture) as the end of each country's Uruguay Round implementation period, as reported in each country's Uruguay Round market access schedule.

(11) LABOR AND THE ENVIRONMENT.—The principal negotiating objectives of the United States with respect to labor and the environment are—

(B) to recognize that parties to a trade agreement retain the right to exercise discretion with respect to investigatory, prosecutorial, regulatory, and compliance matters and to make decisions regarding the allocation of resources to enforcement with respect to other labor or environmental matters determined to have higher priorities, and to recognize that a country is effectively enforcing its laws if a course of action or inaction reflects a reasonable exercise of such discretion, or results from a bona fide decision regarding the allocation of resources and no retaliation may be authorized based on the exercise of these rights or the right to establish domestic labor standards and levels of environmental protection;

(C) to strengthen the capacity of United States trading partners to promote respect for core labor standards (as defined in section 2113(2));

(12) DISPUTE SETTLEMENT AND ENFORCEMENT.—The principal negotiating objectives of the United States with respect to dispute settlement and enforcement of trade agreements are—

(A) to seek provisions in trade agreements providing for resolution of disputes between governments under those trade agreements in an effective, timely, transparent, equitable, and reasoned manner, requiring determinations based on facts and the principles of the agreements, with the goal of increasing compliance with the agreements;

(B) to seek to strengthen the capacity of the Trade Policy Review Mechanism of the World Trade Organization to review compliance with commitments;

(i) the ability to resort to dispute settlement under the applicable agreement;

(ii) the availability of equivalent dispute settlement procedures; and

(iii) the availability of equivalent remedies.

(ii) such continuance of exiting duty-free or excise treatment, or

(iii) such additional duties, as the President determines to be required or appropriate to carry out any such trade agreement.

The President shall notify the Congress of the President's intention to enter into an agreement under this subsection.

(2) LIMITATIONS.—No proclamation may be made under paragraph (1) that—

DIVISION C—ANDEAN TRADE PREFERENCE ACT

TITLE XXXI—ANDEAN TRADE PREFERENCE

SEC. 3101. SHORT TITLE; FINDINGS.

(a) SHORT TITLE.—This title may be cited as the "Andean Trade Preference Expansion Act".

(b) FINDINGS.—Congress makes the following findings:

(1) Since the Andean Trade Preference Act was enacted in 1991, it has had a positive impact on United States trade with Bolivia, Colombia, Ecuador, and Peru. Two-way trade has doubled, with the United States serving as the leading source of imports and leading export market for each of the Andean beneficiary countries. This has resulted in increased jobs and expanded export opportunities in both the United States and the Andean region.

(2) The Andean Trade Preference Act has been a key element in the United States counternarcotics strategy in the Andean region, promoting export diversification and broad-based economic development that provides sustainable economic alternatives to drug-crop production, strengthening the legitimate economies of Andean countries and creating viable alternatives to illicit trade in coca.

(3) Notwithstanding the success of the Andean Trade Preference Act, the Andean region remains threatened by political and economic instability and fragility, vulnerable to the consequences of the drug war and fierce global competition for its legitimate trade.

(4) The continuing instability in the Andean region poses a threat to the security interests of the United States and the world. This problem has been partially addressed through foreign aid, such as Plan Colombia, enacted by Congress in 2000. However, foreign aid alone is not sufficient. Enhancement of legitimate trade with the United States provides an alternative means for reviving and stabilizing the economies in the Andean region.

(5) The Andean Trade Preference Act constitutes a tangible commitment by the United States to the promotion of prosperity, stability, and democracy in the beneficiary countries.

"(E) BILATERAL EMERGENCY ACTIONS.—

"(i) IN GENERAL.—The President may take bilateral emergency tariff actions of a kind described in section 4 of the Annex with respect to any apparel article imported from an ATPEA beneficiary country if the application of tariff treatment under subparagraph (B) to such article results in conditions that would be cause for the taking of such actions under such section 4 with respect to a like article described in the same 8-digit subheading of the HTS that is imported from Mexico.

"(ii) RULES RELATING TO BILATERAL EMERGENCY ACTION.—For purposes of applying bilateral emergency action under this subparagraph—

TITLE XLII—OTHER PROVISIONS

SEC. 4201. TRANSPARENCY IN NAFTA TRIBUNALS.

(a) Findings.—Congress makes the following findings:

(1) Chapter Eleven of the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) allows foreign investors to file claims against signatory countries that directly or indirectly nationalize or expropriate an investment, or take measures "tantamount to nationalization or expropriation" of such an investment.

(2) Foreign investors have filed several claims against the United States, arguing that regulatory activity has been "tantamount to nationalization or expropriation". Most notably, a Canadian chemical company claimed $970,000,000 in damages allegedly resulting from a California State regulation banning the use of a gasoline additive produced by that company.

(3) A claim under Chapter Eleven of the NAFTA is adjudicated by a three-member panel, whose deliberations are largely secret.

(4) While it may be necessary to protect the confidentiality of business sensitive information, the general lack of transparency of these proceedings has been excessive.

(b) Purpose.—The purpose of this amendment is to ensure that the proceedings of the NAFTA investor protection tribunals are as transparent as possible, consistent with the need to protect the confidentiality of business sensitive information.

(c) CHAPTER 11 OF NAFTA.—The President shall negotiate with Canada and Mexico an amendment to Chapter Eleven of the NAFTA to ensure the fullest transparency possible with respect to the dispute settlement mechanism in that Chapter, consistent with the need to protect information that is classified or confidential, by—

(1) ensuring that all requests for dispute settlement under Chapter Eleven are promptly made public;

(2) ensuring that with respect to Chapter Eleven—

(A) all proceedings, submissions, findings, and decisions are promptly made public; and

(B) all hearings are open to the public; and

(3) establishing a mechanism under that Chapter for acceptance of amicus curiae submissions from businesses, unions, and nongovernmental organizations.

(d) CERTIFICATION REQUIREMENTS.—Within one year of the date of enactment of this Act, the U.S. Trade Representative shall certify to Congress that the President has fulfilled the requirements set forth in subsection (c).

SEC. 4202. EXPRESSION OF SOLIDARTIY WITH ISRAEL IN ITS FIGHT AGAINST TERRORISM.

(a) FINDINGS.—Congress makes the following findings:

(1) The United States and Israel are now engaged in a common struggle against terrorism and are on the frontlines of a conflict thrust upon them against their will.

(2) President George W. Bush declared on November 21, 2001, "We fight the terrorists and we fight all of those who give them aid. America has a message for the nations of the world: If you harbor terrorists, you are terrorists. If you train or arm a terrorist, you are a terrorist. If you feed a terrorist or fund a terrorist, you are a terrorist, and you will be held accountable by the United States and our friends.".

(3) The United States has committed to provide resources to states on the frontline in the war against terrorism.

(b) SENSE OF CONGRESS.—The Congress—

(1) stands in solidarity with Israel, a frontline state in the war against terrorism, as it takes necessary steps to provide security to its people by dismantling the terrorist infrastructure in the Palestinian areas;

(2) remains committed to Israel's right to self-defense;

(3) will continue to assist Israel in strengthening its homeland defenses;

(4) condemns Palestinian suicide bombings;

(5) demands that the Palestinian Authority fulfill its commitment to dismantle the terrorist infrastructure in the Palestinian areas;

(6) urges all Arab states, particularly the United States allies, Egypt and Saudi Arabia, to declare their unqualified opposition to all forms of terrorism, particularly suicide bombing, and to act in concert with the United States to stop the violence; and

(7) urges all parties in the region to pursue vigorously efforts to establish a just, lasting, and comprehensive peace in the Middle East.

REMOVAL OF INJUNCTION OF SECRECY—TREATY DOCUMENT NO. 107-7

Mr. REID. Mr. President, as in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that the Injunction of Secrecy be removed from the following protocol transmitted following the recess of the Senate on May 9, 2002, by the President of the United States:

The Protocol to the Agreement of the International Atomic Energy Agency Regarding Safeguards in the United States (Treaty Document No. 107-7);

I further ask that the protocol be considered as having been read the first time; that it be referred, with accompanying papers, to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed; and that the President's message be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The message of the President is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I submit herewith, for Senate advice and consent to ratification, the Protocol Additional to the Agreement Between the United States of America and the International Atomic Energy Agency for the Application of Safeguards in the United States of America, with annexes, signed at Vienna June 12, 1998 (the "Additional Protocol"). Adhering to the Additional Protocol will bolster U.S. efforts to strengthen nuclear safeguards and promote the nonproliferation of nuclear weapons, which is a cornerstone of U.S. foreign and national security policy.

At the end of the Persian Gulf War, the world learned the extent of Iraq's clandestine pursuit of an advanced program to develop nuclear weapons. In order to increase the capability of the International Atomic Energy Agency (the "Agency") to detect such programs, the international community negotiated a Model Additional Protocol (the "Model Protocol") to strengthen the Agency's nuclear safeguards system. The Model Protocol is to be used to amend the existing bilateral safeguards agreements of states with the Agency.

The Model Protocol is a milestone in U.S. efforts to strengthen the safeguards system of the Agency and thereby to reduce the threat posed by clandestine efforts to develop a nuclear weapon capability. By accepting the Model Protocol, states assume new obligations that will provide far greater transparency for their nuclear activities. Specifically, the Model Protocol strengthens safeguards by requiring states to provide broader declarations to the Agency about their nuclear programs and nuclear-related activities and by expanding the access rights of the Agency.

The United States signed the Additional Protocol at Vienna on June 12, 1998. The Additional Protocol is a bilateral treaty that would supplement and amend the Agency verification arrangements under the existing Agreement Between the United States of America and the International Atomic Energy Agency for the Application of Safeguards in the United States of America of November 18, 1977 (the "Voluntary Offer"), which entered into force on December 9, 1980. The Additional Protocol will enter into force when the United States notifies the Agency that the U.S. statutory and constitutional requirements for entry into force have been met.

The Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons (the "NPT") requires non-nuclear-weapon states parties to accept Agency safeguards on their nuclear activities. The United States, as a nuclear-weapon state party to the NPT, is not obligated to accept Agency safeguards on its nuclear activities. Nonetheless, it has been the announced policy of the United States since 1967 to permit the application of Agency safeguards to its nuclear facilities—excluding only those of direct national security significance. The Additional Protocol similarly allows the United States to exclude its application in instances where the United States decides that its application would result in access by the Agency to activities with direct national security significance to the United States or access to locations or information associated with such activities. I am, therefore, confident that the Additional Protocol, given our right to invoke the national security exclusion and to manage access in accordance with established principles for implementing these provisions, can be implemented in a fashion that is fully consistent with U.S. national security.

By submitting itself to the same safeguards on all of its civil nuclear activities that non-nuclear-weapon states parties to the NPT are subject to, the United States intends to demonstrate that adherence to the Model Protocol does not place other countries at a commercial disadvantage. The U.S. signature of the Additional Protocol was an important factor in the decisions of many non-nuclear-weapon states to accept the Model Protocol and provided significant impetus toward their early acceptance. I am satisfied that the provisions of the Additional Protocol, given our right to manage access in accordance with Article 7 and established implementation principles, will allow the United States to prevent the dissemination of proliferation-sensitive information and protect proprietary or commercially sensitive information.

I also transmit, for the information of the Senate, the report of the Department of State concerning the Additional Protocol, including an article-by-article analysis, a subsidiary arrangement, and a letter the United States has sent to the Agency concerning the Additional Protocol. Additionally, the recommended legislation necessary to implement the Additional Protocol will be submitted separately to the Congress.

I believe that the Additional Protocol is in the best interests of the United States. Our acceptance of this agreement will sustain our longstanding record of voluntary acceptance of nuclear safeguards and greatly strengthen our ability to promote universal adoption of the Model Protocol, a central goal of my nuclear nonproliferation policy. Widespread acceptance of the Protocol will contribute significantly to our nonproliferation objectives as well as strengthen U.S., allied, and international security. I, therefore, urge the Senate to give early and favorable consideration to the Additional Protocol, and to give advice and consent to its ratification.

GEORGE W. BUSH.
THE WHITE HOUSE, May 9, 2002.

RECORD TO REMAIN OPEN

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the RECORD remain open until 2 p.m. today for insertion of statements and the introduction of bills and resolutions.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

TRIBUTE TO JERRY RICH

HON. JOHNNY ISAKSON

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. ISAKSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend an American who exemplifies the opportunities and possibilities our free enterprise system brings to all Americans and, like so many Americans, an individual who has taken his success and its rewards and found a way to share it in a meaningful way.

I am pleased to rise today and commend Mr. Jerry Rich of Sugar Grove, Illinois, and I am very pleased to be joined by Speaker DENNIS HASTERT in this tribute. As the age of technology dawned in the 1970s, Jerry Rich applied his entrepreneurial spirit and personal dedication to develop a technology system capable of providing those in the financial markets with the ability to monitor disparate information on a single screen. Jerry Rich's innovation is now shared in the capital markets and on Wall Street by everyone. His innovation and success ultimately led to a merger of his company with Reuters and retirement from his business in 1988. But like so many Americans, Jerry Rich applied his success to his passion, and his passion to benefit America's youth.

Jerry Rich bought eight farms and combined them into what is now known as Sugar Grove Estate. A passionate golfer, Jerry set out to build and develop a unique golf course, and unique it is. Originally nine holes with three separate tees, Rich Harvest Links is now an eighteen-hole championship golf course, ranked by Golf Magazine as one of the top ten new private golf courses in America. Rich Harvest Acres has a staff of forty-five attending to this challenging 7,446-yard, par 72 golf course. While Rich Harvest Links is one of the most exclusive in America, currently with twenty-five members and a plan for twenty-five more in the future, it also is a golf course that Jerry Rich shares with amateur golfers in the great State of Illinois.

Jerry is very active in the youth program, "Hook a Kid on Golf," which introduces youths to the game of golf and has spread to twenty-nine states in America and Canada. He started a foundation that funds the operation for "Hook a Kid on Golf" in Illinois where, last year alone, one thousand five hundred children attended five-day clinics.

Jerry Rich embodies everything the American entrepreneurial spirit represents. Throughout his life he has taken risks, applied knowledge,sought innovation and built a business. From its success he has been rewarded, and with that success he shared with others. This is what America is all about, and Rich Harvest Links is not just a tribute to golf, but a tribute to a great man of Illinois who cares: Jerry Rich.

YUCCA MOUNTAIN REPOSITORY SITE APPROVAL ACT

SPEECH OF

HON. MARK UDALL

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 2002

Mr. UDALL of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, after careful consideration, I have decided that I cannot support this resolution.

The resolution would approve the site at Yucca Mountain, Nevada, for a high-level nuclear waste repository. This is the site with which the Governor of Nevada has submitted a notice of disapproval under the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982, as amended. Congressional approval of the joint resolution would override the governor's objections and would endorse the decision of the President approving the site. Under the law, the Energy Department would then be required to request the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to issue a construction license for the repository.

In my opinion, to vote for the resolution would mean voting to make a premature decision, based on incomplete science and without adequate consideration of all the important factors involved. I do not think that would be a responsible course or in the public interest.

The President's decision evidently was based on the recommendation of Energy Secretary Abraham, who said that he was convinced that sound science supports the Yucca Mountain site.

In reaching that conclusion the Secretary evidently relied on the Energy Department's comprehensive performance assessment. However, in recent months three other agencies have issued reports that cast serious doubt on that conclusion.

Last September, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission's Advisory Committee on Nuclear Waste reported that, among other things, the system-performance assessment used assumptions that "mask a realistic assessment of risk" and that its analyses were "assumption-based, not evidence-supported."

Then, in December, the General Accounting Office identified more than 290 relevant issues, including such matters as the geologic integrity of the site and the flow of water through the site, and concluded that "DOE will not be able to submit an acceptable application [to the Nuclear Regulatory Commission] within the express statutory time frame for several years because it will take that long to resolve many technical issues."

In January of this year, the Nuclear Waste Technical Review Board reported that it had "limited confidence in current performance estimates" underlying the Energy Department's recommendation and that it considered the technical bases for those estimates to be "weak to moderate"—far from a ringing endorsement, especially for a project of such scope and importance.

Those are not the only analyses that give me pause. Another appeared just last month in a Science magazine article by Rodney C. Ewing, a faculty member at the University of Michigan, and Allison McFarlane, who is in the Security Studies Program at MIT. In the article, Dr. Ewing and Dr. McFarlane note that "the passive properties of the [Yucca Mountain] repository site do not provide a long-term barrier to radionuclide release." That means there will be a need to rely on other things—engineering fixes—to prevent such releases. They say that the choice of Yucca Mountain as a repository site "is based on an unsound engineering strategy and poor use of present understanding of the properties of spent nuclear fuel," and that "there are other unresolved technical issues," including "the continuing controversy over the frequency and impact of volcanic activity" at Yucca Mountain.

And they conclude that "a project of this importance, which has gone on for 20 years, should not go forward until the relevant scientific issues have been thoughtfully addressed . . . To move ahead without first addressing the outstanding scientific issues will only continue to marginalize the role of science and detract from the credibility of the DOE effort."

I agree with that conclusion, which is why I am troubled by what seems to be a rush to judgment on the part of the Administration.

I do think that there are very important considerations that argue in favor of establishing a repository for the kind of high-level nuclear wastes that are at issue here, particularly the potential role of such a repository for disposition of military wastes such as spent fuel from our Navy's nuclear-powered vessels and in connection with our efforts to avoid proliferation of nuclear weapons.

However, I think questions about Yucca Mountain in the context of homeland security are not clear-cut.

On the one hand, the Administration points to the fact that more than 161 million Americans now live within 75 miles of a site where highly radioactive materials are stored and that while these facilities "should be able to withstand current terrorist threats . . . that may not remain the case in the future," as Secretary Abraham wrote in his February 14th letter to the President, and would be "better secured . . . at Yucca Mountain, on federal land, far from population centers, that can withstand an attack well beyond any that is reasonably conceivable."

On the other hand, there is something to be said for the argument that transporting large quantities of such materials over long distances would multiply the current opportunities for terrorist attacks because the vehicles doing the transporting would be attractive targets that could not always be totally concealed.

Further, I am not convinced that the Administration has adequately made the case that Yucca Mountain is the right site for such a repository or that "a repository at Yucca Mountain is indispensable" for our energy security, as Secretary Abraham also claims in his February 14th letter to the President.

So, as things now stand, I am not persuaded that the case has been made for selection of the Yucca Mountain site, and I therefore am not ready to override the Governor's objections by voting for this resolution.

TRIBUTE TO THE JOHN BOOTH SENIOR CENTER

HON. BENJAMIN L. CARDIN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. CARDIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor one of my constituents for her commitment to our senior citizens.

Since 1965, the John Booth Senior Center has served the folks of East Baltimore. When first opened, the center was only one of 350 senior centers in the United States. Today, thanks to the efforts of its tireless director, June Goldfield, the center not only offers a community gathering place but a support service for East Baltimore's older citizens, enabling many of them to stay in the community as active, vital participants.

June began her full time employment with Baltimore City Department of Recreation and Parks almost 15 years ago and has dedicated herself to preserving and enhancing services for seniors. The center boasts unending activities and instruction as well as a close relationship with Hopkins Bayview Medical Center, which offers medical assistance to members. The ethnic food festival, prepared by center members, is among the most enjoyable activities.

I hope my colleagues will join me in congratulating June Goldfield on her public service and wishing her well in her retirement.

INTRODUCTION OF THE SMALL ENTERPRISE PAPERWORK REDUCTION ACT

HON. NYDIA M. VELÁZQUEZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Ms. VELÁZQUEZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce the Small Business Enterprise Paperwork Reduction Act, a bill to relieve the burden of regulation compliance documentation.

Federal regulations are set to ensure worker safety and to protect public health and the environment. This nation's small businesses—representing 99 percent of all employers and constituting half our economic product—place a high value on compliance with regulations. Unfortunately, these requirements disproportionately burden small businesses, which spend millions of hours annually meeting federal paperwork and record-keeping requirements to prove that they have complied with regulations.

The time and effort spent by businesses and taxpayers to meet paperwork demands are estimated to equal almost 10 percent of the nation's Gross Domestic Product. Clearly, this is a waste of time and resources better spent creating jobs and furnishing goods and services.

Federal paperwork consistently ranks among the top 10 problems for small businesses. Time spent filling out forms, takes small business owners away from conducting our nation's business. It takes doctors away from patient care. It takes restaurant owners away from serving patrons. It takes your auto mechanic away from fixing your transmission.

The Paperwork Reduction Act of 1980 (PRA), since amended, seeks to minimize the cost and burden imposed by federal paperwork requirements and to maximize the usefulness of the information collected. The PRA of 1995 required reduction of paperwork burdens government-wide. Unfortunately, the burden did not decrease since 1995—in fact, it has increased by nearly 180 million burden hours during Fiscal Year 2000. This is the second largest one-year increase since the act was passed. It is also an outrage.

The PRA established the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs (OIRA) within the Office of Management and Budget to review and clear agency information collection requirements. Unfortunately, OIRA has been diverted from its original mission by an Executive Order that makes it a central clearinghouse for agency rulemaking actions. Review of regulations now takes up most of OIRA's time and resources.

This legislation seeks to bring OIRA back towards its original mission—to ensure that Federal agencies do not over-burden businesses and the public with requests for information and documentation.

The Office of Management and Budget listed a total of 710 PRA violations for Fiscal Year 2000.

This legislation will strengthen the PRA by requiring OMB to do more to enforce the law on paperwork burden violations.

In addition, by making violations of the Paperwork Reduction Act a more public matter, it will increase public awareness and force agencies to focus on the burdens they impose on small business.

Lastly, this legislation requires federal agencies and OMB to track the paperwork burdens on small businesses by industry type. Congress and the public should be aware of what burdens are being placed on our small businesses by Federal agencies.

Small businesses create 75 percent of the new jobs in America. To protect this economic dynamo, we must be careful about the burdens we place on these firms. If the burden of government paperwork becomes too great, it will stall the very engine of economic growth that has made America strong. This legislation is designed to tighten the load, so that small businesses can get back to work providing jobs, goods and services in their communities.

NATIONAL CORRECTIONAL OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES WEEK

HON. JOHN E. SWEENEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today, as a co-chair of the Correctional Officers Caucus, to honor the men and women working in our correctional facilities. On a daily basis, correctional personnel perform a wide range of jobs, from the routine to the extraordinary. Their work often goes unnoticed, but the efforts of correctional officers and employees were never more apparent than on September 11, 2001.

Following the horrific terrorist attacks, the New York Correction Department immediately sent personnel to assist in rescue operations. Department staff controlled traffic congestion enabling emergency vehicles to reach Ground Zero and assisted firefighters by delivering fuel to needy fire trucks. They built a small "tent city" equipped with heat, electricity, telephone and fax lines to provide additional support services for the temporary morgue at Bellevue Hospital. The Department also conducted security clearances and issued thousands of photo ID cards to secure access to Ground Zero and other restricted areas.

Mr. Speaker, in the aftermath of the terrorist attacks, correctional officers and employees were deployed 24 hours a day, seven days a week, to assist in various rescue and recovery efforts.

I have introduced H. Con. Res. 390 to recognize the week of May 6th as National Correctional Officers and Employees Week, in gratitude for the courage and professionalism of the New York City Correction Department in the face of tragedy, as well as the daily work of all correctional officers and employees who perform their jobs with dedication and resolve.

Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to honor our Nation's correctional officers and employees. I urge my colleagues to recognize these men and women by cosponsoring this important resolution.

EXPRESSING SOLIDARITY WITH ISRAEL IN ITS FIGHT AGAINST TERRORISM

SPEECH OF

HON. MARK GREEN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 2002

Mr. GREEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I offer these comments for the RECORD to supplement my vote on House Resolution 392—the resolution in support of Israel in the war against terrorism—which this body approved on May 2.

I voted in favor of the resolution because I believe what it said was both substantially accurate and needed to be formally declared by this Congress and this Nation: that there is no acceptable justification for terrorism in general and suicide bombing in particular. No one—no nation, no organization—can ever be perceived as gaining any advantage militarily, diplomatically, or politically from this reprehensible tactic.

I offer these comments because I'm afraid the resolution told only part of the story. What the resolution said wasn't nearly as controversial as what it didn't say. Because while it did incorporate some language addressing the humanitarian concerns of the Palestinian people, even the most ardent supporter of the current government in Israel would have to agree that the resolution was not as balanced as it could, or should, have been.

That's why I voted against ordering the previous question on the rule for this resolution. To put it simply, I hoped we could open up the debate on the resolution to include additional language. In my opinion, we could have made the resolution more balanced, portrayed a fuller and more exact picture of the situation, and made it more productive in achieving a lasting peace in the region. In a House of 435 Members, there were only 82 who voted with me on this, and only three of those were Republicans. I wish we had more, because I think we would have ended up with a better piece of legislation.

In particular, I think the resolution would have been dramatically improved had it specifically mentioned our commitment to a Palestinian State, and the vision for the future most reasonable people share on this issue: two independent states, one Israeli and one Palestinian, living side-by-side in peace.

LAKE ALLATOONA AWARENESS WEEK

HON. JOHNNY ISAKSON

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. ISAKSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to acknowledge Lake Allatoona Awareness Week as proclaimed by Governor Roy Barnes of Georgia.

Lake Allatoona is located north of Atlanta in the foothills of north Georgia, and covers parts of Cherokee, Cobb, and Bartow Counties. It provides drinking water for over 500,000 people and recreation activities for millions.

Two years ago the Lake Allatoona Preservation Authority, LAPA, was created to lead the effort to protect and preserve this vital resource. The lake provides habitat for a number of endangered species, including the Etowah Darter, Gray Bat, Southern Acornshell, and the American Bald Eagle.

Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, May 7, LAPA and the Army Corp of Engineers signed a historic $5 million joint study to plan for the preservation of the lake for generations to come. There is no greater way to preserve than to plan for the future, and for the citizens of North Georgia and this great natural resource the future is bright.

TRIBUTE TO PITTSBURGH REGIONAL ALLIANCE

HON. MELISSA A. HART

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Ms. HART. Mr. Speaker, recently a local economic development group—the Pittsburgh Regional Alliance (PRA)—was selected as one of the top groups in the Nation. Each year, the editorial staff of Site Selection selects the Top 10 Economic Development Groups for their role in bringing large-scale corporate expansion projects to their respective communities. These standards used to make their decisions included: Capital investment in the service area during 2001; new jobs created in the service area; capital investment per capita; and new jobs created per 100,000 population.

The PRA is an outstanding source of research and advocacy for regional development in western Pennsylvania, and I would like to submit to the RECORD Site Selection's explanation of why they were awarded this great honor:

> Pittsburgh has been the manufacturing home of big steel, but much of that industry has closed and moved out of the country. The Three Rivers area has suffered through a downturn and repositioned itself as a city of the future. Building on the historic strengths of the area's energy traditions, the Pittsburgh Regional Alliance (PRA) helped Siemens Westinghouse Power choose a 22-acre site as the location for its $122-million, state-of-the-art fuel cell manufacturing plant.
>
> After the passage of Greenhouse Legislation by the state legislature, the PRA has begun to pursue an area Pittsburgh Bio/Venture Life Sciences Greenhouse approach to attract new industry. With cooperation with various academic institutions, the Bio Greenhouse hopes to position the area as a leader in biological research and development. "The Greenhouse will be the centerpiece of technology commercialization and economic development efforts," says D. Lansing Taylor, president and Chief Executive Officer of Cellomics. "It will also be the single organization to exploit synergies among university research strengths and facilities, and coordinate those efforts with economic development."
>
> The PRA, in conjunction with the Pennsylvania Dept. of Community and Economic Development, helped bring the world's largest producer of medical devices, Lake Region Medical, to the area. The facility will manufacture guide wires used for diagnostics and machine products used in the medical field, and will create at least 140 new jobs. The facility has qualified for a state financial package, including an Opportunity Grant and Jobs Creation Tax Credits.

I congratulate the PRA on this great award, and look forward to continue working with them as we bring back new growth and opportunity to western Pennsylvania.

HONORING ELAINE MARTIN

HON. C.L. "BUTCH" OTTER

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. OTTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate Elaine Martin of Nampa, ID, on receiving the Small Business Advocate of the Year Award. Elaine was a struggling farmer in 1985 when she decided to enter the highway contracting business. With a $25,000 loan from her widowed mother she started a highway fencing company that, within a few years, became one of the largest guardrail companies in the western United States. Elaine's company, MarCon, now grosses over $8 million a year, and has grown from 5 employees to more than 26 full-time employees. Starting with no knowledge of highway contracting, she's had the courage to explore every aspect of the business, from working alongside her crews to fighting red tape on behalf of contractors and small businesses everywhere. Elaine Martin has been a tremendous success, and Idahoans are extremely proud of her and the well deserved recognition she's received.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS

HON. MARK UDALL

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. UDALL of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, on May 1, I attended a ceremony in the White House at which the Congressional Medal of Honor was awarded posthumously to Captain Jon Swanson, who was killed during the war in Vietnam. As a result, I was not present for rollcall vote No. 120, on the Sanders of Vermont amendment to H.R. 2871, a bill to reauthorize the Export-Import Bank of the United States. Had I been present, I would have voted "yea" on that amendment.

Also, on Tuesday, May 7, I was in Colorado for a ceremony marking the return to the United States of the remains of Daniel Aaron Romero, a Colorado Army National Guard sergeant serving with the 19th Special Forces Group. Sergeant Romero was killed April 15 when an accidental explosion rocked a demolition range in Kandahar, Afghanistan.

As a result, I was not present for rollcall vote No. 127, on the bill designating the Federal Building located at 5100 Paint Branch Parkway in College Park, MD, as the Harvey W. Wiley Federal Building. Had I been present, I would have voted "yea" on that question.

For the same reason, I was absent during rollcall vote No. 128, on the concurrent resolution expressing the sense of Congress regarding the national importance of Health Care Coverage Month. Had I been present for that vote, I would have voted "yea."

For the same reason, I was absent during rollcall vote No. 129, on ordering the previous question on H. Res. 414, the rule dealing with H.J. Res. 84. Had I been present, I would have voted "yea" on that rollcall.

And, for the same reason, I was absent during rollcall vote No. 130, on H. Res. 414, the rule dealing with H.J. Res. 84. Had I been present, I would have voted "yea" on adoption of that resolution.

Also, for the same reason, I was absent during rollcall vote No. 131, on the motion to suspend the rules and concur in the Senate amendments to H.R. 3525, the Enhanced Border Security and Visa Entry Reform Act. Had I been present, I would have voted "yea" on that motion.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. CURT WELDON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. WELDON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, on rollcall No. 133, I was inadvertently not recorded. Had I been present, I would have voted "yea."

TRIBUTE TO JAMES D. TSCHECHTELIN

HON. BENJAMIN L. CARDIN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. CARDIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay special tribute to James D. Tschechtelin, who is retiring in June as president of Baltimore City Community College. As president of BCCC, Mr. Tschechtelin has worked tirelessly on behalf of BCCC students and on behalf of the greater Baltimore community.

During his 12-year tenure, he helped educate and train a world-class workforce that is critical to the economic success of the entire Baltimore region. He has worked to Modernize BCCC's facilities, increase state funding, improve outreach and enhance responsiveness to businesses. His commitment and dedication to excellence has helped transform BCCC into a leading educational facility that meets the needs of businesses for talented employees.

We are fortunate to have had Mr. Tschechtelin at the helm of BCCC. His vision and dedication have helped the college meet new challenges. In recognition of his success, the BCCC Foundation Board has created the James D. Tschechtelin Workforce Scholarship Endowment, a scholarship that helps working students by providing half of their educational costs.

I hope that my colleagues will join me in saluting the accomplishments of James Tschechtelin as president of BCCC. His tenure has marked a turning point for the college as a respected institution that meets the educational needs of its students.

FARM SECURITY ACT OF 2002 (H.R. 2646)

HON. TODD TIAHRT

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. TIAHRT. Mr. Speaker, today I offer my congratulations to Chairman COMBEST, the Ranking Member, Mr. STENHOLM, and the 2002 Farm Bill conferees for their hard work in crafting a bipartisan bill that will help America's farmers.

The Farm Security Act of 2002 is the product of 50 hearings over two years. I am pleased that we were able to pass a farm bill that maintains the market-oriented features of the 1996 Farm Bill while fully complying with the Congressional Budget Resolution. This Farm Bill is critically needed by our nation's farmers who are facing the lowest real net cash income on the farm since the Great Depression. Record high costs of production combined with the fifth straight year of record low prices necessitated the quick passage of a farm bill that addresses these critical issues.

Americans rely on a consistent supply of nutritious food, and our farmers are the ones working hard to make this possible. Not only do they supply food for us domestically, but they also are the hands that feed the world. Our farmers deserve our support, and I was pleased to vote in favor of this bipartisan Farm Bill.

Mr. Speaker, despite my support for this bill, I do want to go on record as having serious reservations about the price tag the Farm Bill could have for taxpayers. There is no doubt we need a strong farm bill, which I support. But I am concerned we are voting today on an overinflated six-year bill that has the potential to cost taxpayers far more than the estimated $170 billion. We must guard against turning the family farm into the federal government's farm. My concern is that this bill, while containing good provisions, is dangerously close to moving beyond reasonable support for farmers into warding the family farm to the welfare state.

The American dream for agricultural producers is not a land of neo-government farms, but rather individual opportunity to succeed by profitably working the land they love and own. This is the farmer's dream. Then, when help is needed due to unforseen events like natural disasters, Uncle Sam can offer assistance that encourages and motivates.

Another concern is that the 2002 Farm Bill abuses agriculture subsidies by reviving price supports for commodities such as mohair, wool and honey. It also distorts the market by adding subsidies for milk, peanuts, lentils and chickpeas. I am disappointed that provisions in the Farm Security Act of 2002 succumbed to the pressures of special interest groups while ignoring the best interests of the citizens and farmers I represent and the American taxpayer.

Despite disagreeing with many of this bill's provisions, I will vote in favor of the Farm Bill, because overall, it provides much-needed farm policy for the next six years and will help America's farmers. Without this bill, we would have automatically been forced back to 1938/1949 permanent farm laws, which would have devastated our economy.

Mr. Speaker, I hear from many constituents in the Fourth District of Kansas who care deeply about conservation. I am pleased to tell them that the Farm Security Act of 2002 builds on the current voluntary incentive programs for conservation that have proven to work. Farmers and ranchers will have the opportunity to participate in new conservation programs as well. I am pleased to know that the men and women who work the land and care most about it are the ones who are being provided with the power and means to better protect the soil, water and wildlife through the various conservation programs.

This farm bill includes more than $200 million in federal funding for the Commodity Credit Corporation Bioenergy Program, which will help advance the production of biofuels, including ethanol. I have had many Kansans tell me they support continued investment into ethanol production as a fuel source. The 2002 Farm Bill provides federal assistance to bioenergy producers who purchase agricultural commodities for the purpose of expanding products of biodiesel and fuel grade ethanol.

Mr. Speaker, past farm program levels for sorghum have distorted the market and reduced incentives to plant grain sorghum. I was pleased to see this disparity addressed in the Farm Bill. Equity for Kansas feed grains is important to Kansas farmers, and I strongly support this corrective provision.

I am also pleased that the food stamp program has been simplified allowing states more flexibility in helping those in financial poverty. With the reduction of state reporting requirements, we are allowing states to require households to report changes in household circumstances not less often than once every six months in lieu of reporting changes as they occur. Another simplification in the food stamp program provided for in the Farm Bill allows states the option to exclude, rather than deduct, child support payments, and it allows the use of the Child Support Enforcement Agency data to determine the amount of support paid.

Kansas farmers rely heavily on trade with other countries. With forty percent of U.S. commodities going into the export market, it is essential that producers have access to expanded markets. The 2002 Farm Bill answers this need by comporting with the United States' international trade obligations under the WTO. This allows for the promotion of more free trade for our future. Furthermore, the Farm Bill makes substantial investments in programs designed to aid in the creation, expansion and maintenance of foreign markets for U.S. agriculture products.

Generous support for the Market Access Program, the Food for Progress Program, the Food for Peace Program, the Foreign Market Development Program and the McGovern-Dole International Food for Education and Child Nutrition Program are a few examples of how this Farm Bill helps expand our markets while sharing our bounty with the needy in developing countries around the globe.

Mr. Speaker, research has been recognized in this Farm Bill as being the key to keeping U.S. producers competitive in the world market. The Farm Security Act of 2002 makes a significant new investment in research programs that will help reap rewards for producers and our society for generations to come.

The Farm Bill makes significant investments in improving rural development. Rural development programs are important to sustaining communities by aiding in the development of infrastructure and job creation in rural areas. Our small communities across this country benefit from these programs, and I am pleased that this farm bill recognizes their importance to our American way of life.

Getting broadband Internet service to our rural communities is also a concern I have. With the passage of the 2002 Farm Bill, we will be providing a total of $100 million to provide loans and loan guarantees to allow rural consumers access to high-speed, high-quality broadband services.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to know that value added market development grants have been expanded to meet producers' interests in start-up, farmer-owned, value-added processing facilities. These grants will help establish resource centers to assist producers in value-added endeavors. The Farm Bill recognizes the importance of enabling producers to capture more of the value of their commodities.

The Farm Security Act of 2002 offers farmers and ranchers and all Americans a balanced approach to securing our agriculture security into the future. I commend the Chairman and conferees for their dedication to a quality farm bill.

BRAIN TUMOR ACTION WEEK

HON. SONNY CALLAHAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. CALLAHAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to share with my colleagues a speech written by my dear friend and Alabama native, Adrienne McMillan Burns. Adrienne was diagnosed with a brain tumor three years ago and has served as a shining example of how to survive with grace to people with potentially terminal illnesses ever since.

I have reflected on this tragic condition and Adrienne's case in particular during this Brain Tumor Action Week. It is so important to call attention to the illness, its symptoms, treatment, patient recovery and related issues, and I strongly support the designation of this week to focus on brain tumors.

Adrienne has been an inspiration to me, her many friends and loving family over the length of her illness. I highly recommend her speech to my colleagues. I believe Adrienne's bravery and honesty in confronting and talking about this illness will give courage and inspiration to others in her situation.

To Adrienne, I wish a continuing successful recovery and return to a normal life with her family.

MY JOURNEY WITH A BRAIN TUMOR

(By Adrienne McMillan Burns)

A recent Wall Street Journal article highlighted the fact that a brush with death can temporarily change our perspective on life for the better. Experiencing more than a brush—an extended fight against a potentially fatal disease—has served to sustain such a view for me. I believe these experiences, both brushes and extended fights with death, can ultimately be used to benefit many people. And I believe that those of us with these experiences serve our fellow humans well by sharing our stories.

Three years ago, after giving birth to my first child, I had a grand mal seizure. I awoke the next day in an ICU, and ultimately I was diagnosed with a brain tumor. The diagnosis was good as far as brain tumors go, but it was still a brain tumor, and the overall effect was a fast and harsh realization of my own mortality. I was 32 years old.

Life changed for me. As you might expect, I became interested in brain structure and function, and specifically in my own diagnosis and treatment. But life also changed for me in a more unexpected way. After living a life focused, to a great degree, on my own career goals and personal pleasure, I came to a different point of reference. I began to more fully appreciate that we have responsibilities in our journey on earth, not the least of which is the one to our fellow humans. I came to believe that the responsibility is simply to help one another—from the heart—in whatever way we can do it.

I changed my definition of success. Ralph Waldo Emerson once said, "To know even one life has breathed easier because you have lived, that is to have succeeded." I immediately needed to know that not one, but many lives breathed easier because of me. As I lay down for my surgeon to cut my head open, it became amazingly clear what really mattered to me. It mattered how I treated people—how I developed and conducted myself in relationships, especially my relationship with my maker. It mattered how proud I could be of the way I conducted my life, something no person in the world but me could know. My personal integrity, my adherence to my core beliefs, mattered. That's it. Nothing else.

I survived brain surgery and recovered, and I desperately wanted to share my good fortune. I wanted to make someone "breathe easier." My husband and I left established careers in Washington, DC (mine in the energy industry), and I returned to school to pursue an MBA focused on healthcare management. I was determined to use my experience to influence what I believed to be the most significant way to help others: improving the patient's experience in health care delivery. Personally, I experienced exceptional technical care, but I also experienced tender, compassionate care. It mattered greatly to me that a nurse who handed me medications in the middle of the night smiled as she did so. Her tender smile assured me, as I lay in great vulnerability, that the people to whom I entrusted my life cared about my life. There were other smiles in the hospital, and they had the same effect on me. In retrospect, I'll never know if the smiles really indicated such a care. People could have been smiling for any number of reasons. But I believed it was the care, and that made a difference to me. There was an overall feeling of compassion in the hospital, and I know it had as much to do with my healing as did the expert hands of my surgeon.

My plans focused on systemic change. While not attributing health outcomes solely to smiles (!), I wanted to foster compassionate health care delivery. I wanted to provide hospital environments that allowed doctors, nurses and every other employee to deliver compassionate care along with the very important technical care. I believed that basic respect and appreciation of all employees was at the heart of inducing the much appreciated smile and compassionate care.

With a newly found passion, I set an ambitious goal. I believed systemic change could primarily be effected from the top of an organization, therefore, that's where I wanted to be. I envisioned personally catalyzing movement to a higher health service standard by which every patient in the world eventually would be treated!

Two years later I had a recurrence of the tumor. Again, my surgeon expertly brought me through surgery, and this time I received radiation therapy in hopes of being done with the patient side of the health care world! Other than the affront to my vanity from lost hair, brain radiation wasn't all that bad, and getting to know other patients in the waiting room was a blessing.

In the interim two years, I worked towards my goal. I completed half of the MBA, and I worked at a major academic medicine center. What I learned most during that time is that there are a lot of compassionate, smart people out there working to make patients breathe easier. I learned that we are a fortunate people to have so much effort directed at the goal of improving the lives of others.

I'll finish school this year and, God willing, I'll work to effect smiles and compassion in health care delivery! But the recurrence gave me another, perhaps more important, insight. Not only can I improve lives through systemic efforts in health care delivery, but I also can improve the lives, in small ways, of the people with whom I come into contact each day. I can look people in the eye and smile. I can give people the respect we each deserve. I can seek out the good in all people; if I'm looking for the good, perhaps it's what I'll see, and it will probably influence my relationship with that person. That person probably needs to experience a relationship based on that view of him or herself. M.K. Gandhi once said, "Be the change you want to see in the world." I can do that, and I can do it now. That is significant.

In my experience, appreciation of mortality becomes a filter through which everything is forevermore received. This appreciation brought an amazing shift in my perception, and it's made the world seem an even better place to me. I look for and I find more serenity, compassion, and integrity in the world. I find things more beautiful, and I find more beautiful things. I looked up—to God—and I remembered that He is my compassionate and tender caregiver. After experiencing acute depression, He (and a very good psychiatrist!) led me to rediscover pure, unaltered joy—the kind my three year old seems to feel when I allow him to choose any one thing he wants in the bakery near our home.

So, that tumor, as unwanted as it was, changed my life for the better—forever. It's been said that it's easy to forget a lesson from a brush with death, and I do catch myself taking life for granted on occasion. Yet, there's an underlying permanence to the shift in perception that cannot be reversed for me. I've talked with other patients—brain tumor and otherwise—who've said the same thing. It amazes me. It takes something terribly frightening to make us appreciate all the fortunes we have.

I'll close by going back to my thoughts on responsibility. It seems that many of my friends are searching—soul-searching or otherwise—and it seems that others are too. I want to do my small part to help someone in their search, or to make them breathe easier. Perhaps we all can help. Perhaps those of us who have had the occasion to contemplate mortality, at any level, can perpetuate the important lessons we each learn from the experience. We can tell our stories, thereby reminding ourselves and informing others of what we've found when everything but the basics of life are stripped away. By telling our stones, maybe we help each other to help each other. Maybe then we all breathe a little easier. What a success!!

PROVIDING FOR DISPOSITION OF H.J. RES 84, DISAPPROVING THE ACTION TAKEN BY THE PRESIDENT UNDER SECTION 203 OF THE TRADE ACT OF 1974 TRANSMITTED TO THE CONGRESS ON MARCH 5, 2002

SPEECH OF

HON. MICHAEL N. CASTLE

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 2002

Mr. CASTLE. Madam Speaker, I rise today in strong support of House Joint Resolution 84, disapproving of the President's actions to impose higher tariffs on imported steel products than those recommended by the International Trade Commission, and against the accompanying rule. First, Madam Speaker, let me state in regards to the rule, I feel it is important that this chamber have a full and vigorous debate on the impact of the steel tariffs imposed by the President. This rule is creatively slanted in favor of protectionism and against free and fair trade.

The tariffs, implemented by President Bush on March 5, are a well intentioned, but misguided effort to help the domestic steel industry. Although I agree the steel industry needs to be supported and reformed, protecting it from global competition, which is the essence of free trade, is not the answer. The industries that transport steel and those industries that need steel to make their products in the U.S. have begun to feel the brunt of these protectionist measures. Recent estimates reveal that the restrictions could cost as many as 74,500 jobs in steel consuming industries in order to protect 8,900 steel jobs. In addition, protecting these steel jobs will do nothing to address the needs of the thousands of retired steel workers concerned about their retirement security. Ironically, tax revenue from the jobs in steel transportation and those industries which purchase steel could have been used to provide a solution to these other problems.

The Port of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware, imported 57 percent less steel in 2001 than in 2000 due to federal government steel safeguards—which caused a decrease of 53,000 work hours at the Port. The economic benefits provided by the steel consuming industries and our nation's ports cannot be forgotten in this debate. For example, the Delaware River region generated $70 million in total tax dollars for the State and Federal government in 2001. It is evident that the ITC's tariff recommendations would cost far fewer American jobs in the manufacturing, shipping and port industries.

Furthermore, since the President's decision, our trade partners have begun to retaliate, which could further hurt the U.S. economy. Immediately following the decision, the Russian Government instituted a ban on the importation of U.S. poultry, which adversely affected the poultry industry in Delaware and throughout the nation. Other nations are also announcing retaliatory actions and filing complaints with the World Trade Organization. For example, the European Union has announced a broad range of possible tariffs on U.S. products, some as high as 100 percent, that would affect countless U.S. industries, including citrus and textiles.

I recognize the need to support our domestic steel workers, but these measures must be done in a fair and balanced manner that generates U.S. jobs and spurs the national economy—not in a manner that adversely impacts these two fundamental principles and favors protectionism. Today, I rise in strong support of free and fair trade and the role of the United States in the global economy. At a minimum, I encourage my colleagues to vote against the rule in order to allow a full and fair debate on this legislation to overturn the President's decision. And I hope my colleagues will join me in supporting H.J. Res. 84.

EXPRESSING SOLIDARITY WITH ISRAEL IN ITS FIGHT AGAINST TERRORISM

HON. ZOE LOFGREN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Ms. LOFGREN. Mr. Speaker, I come to the floor of the House of Representatives today in the name of democracy, in the name of hope, and in the name of peace.

As long-standing supporters of Israel, we recognize and respect Israel's unquestioned right to self-defense.

The United States has a long history of promoting and supporting democracies. It has long considered Israel its closest ally in the Middle East, because Israel is a democracy.

It is because of our passion for democracy that we cast votes against the procedural steps needed to bring House Resolution 392 to the floor.

These procedural steps prevented any amendments or any substitute resolutions to be considered by the Congress. We were not permitted to consider or debate either Senator LIEBERMAN's or Congressman DEFAZIO's language.

We were not given the opportunity to meet with our constituents and hear their thoughts and concerns on this divisive and complicated matter. Nor were there any hearings on this resolution. This is wrong and does not speak to debate that is central to our democratic process.

While we support House Resolution 392 in its final form, we have concerns that this resolution presents a one-sided view of a many-sided reality.

We cannot ignore the suffering of the Palestinian people and the loss of innocent civilians.

We cannot ignore the economic hardship the Palestinians have endured as they continue their attempts to create their own Democratic nation.

And we cannot ignore the physical damage done to Palestinian infrastructure in Jenin, in Ramallah and other towns in the West Bank.

Even with the Resolution's shortcomings, we believe it is critical to speak out against acts of terrorism that have claimed the lives of thousands of innocent Israeli civilians.

The United States is scarred by its own September 11th experience and we have a new and somber national consciousness of terrorism on our soil.

We continue to hold out hope that the Israelis and the Palestinians will be able to achieve the peace of the brave that has proven so elusive. We are confident that the United States will be a true partner for peace and help bring a 21st Century Marshall Plan of resources and hope to those who today carry a rage of desperation.

REMEMBERING HARRY NORMAN

HON. JOHNNY ISAKSON

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. ISAKSON. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the people of Atlanta, Georgia suffered a great loss with the passing of Mr. Harry Norman.

Harry Norman was one of the great leaders in America's real estate industry. Mr. Norman built Harry Norman Realtors into one of the nations great real estate brokerage companies. Through his tireless efforts in the Atlanta Board of Realtors, he ensured the highest standards of ethics and professionalism in the industry.

There was not a community cause or charity of importance in Atlanta that was not blessed to have the support of Harry Norman. In every sense of the word Harry Norman was a gentleman's gentleman.

On a personal note, Mr. Speaker, Harry Norman was an inspiration to me during my real estate career in Atlanta. Next to my father, I know of no one in the business that I admired more. I extend my sympathy to his wife, Amy, and the extended family at Harry Norman Realtors.

SAY NO TO CONSCRIPTION

HON. RON PAUL

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. PAUL. Mr. Speaker, I hope my colleagues who believe that the current war on terrorism justifies violating the liberty of millions of young men by reinstating a military draft will consider the eloquent argument against conscription in the attached speech by Daniel Webster. Then-representative Webster delivered his remarks on the floor of the House in opposition to a proposal to institute a draft during the War of 1812. Webster's speech remains one of the best statements of the Constitutional and moral case against conscription.

Despite the threat posed to the very existence of the young republic by the invading British Empire, Congress ultimately rejected the proposal to institute a draft. If the new nation of America could defeat what was then the most powerful military empire in the world without a draft, there is no reason why we cannot address our current military needs with a voluntary military.

Webster was among the first of a long line of prominent Americans, including former President Ronald Reagan and Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan, to recognize that a draft violates the fundamental principles of liberty this country was founded upon.

In order to reaffirm support for individual liberty and an effective military, I have introduced H. Con. Res. 368, which expresses the sense of Congress against reinstating a military draft. I urge my colleagues to read Daniel Webster's explanation of why the draft is incompatible with liberty government and cosponsor H. Con. Res. 368.

ON—CONSCRIPTION

(By Daniel Webster)

During America's first great war, waged against Great Britain, the Madison Administration tried to introduce a conscription bill into Congress. This bill called forth one of Daniel Webster's most eloquent efforts, in a powerful opposition to conscription. The speech was delivered in the House of Representatives on December 9, 1814; the following is a condensation.

This bill indeed is less undisguised in its object, and less direct in its means, than some of the measures proposed. It is an attempt to exercise the power of forcing the free men of this country into the ranks of an army, for the general purposes of war, under color of a military service. It is a distinct system, introduced for new purposes, and not connected with any power, which the Constitution has conferred on Congress.

But, Sir, there is another consideration. The services of the men to be raised under this act are not limited to those cases in which alone this Government is entitled to the aid of the militia of the States. These cases are particularly stated in the Constitution—"to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, or execute the laws."

The question is nothing less, than whether the most essential rights of personal liberty shall be surrendered, and despotism embraced in its worst form. When the present generation of men shall be swept away, and that this Government ever existed shall be a matter of history only, I desire that it may then be known, that you have not proceeded in your course unadmonished and unforewarned. Let it then be known, that there were those, who would have stopped you, in the career of your measures, and held you back, as by the skirts of your garments, from the precipice, over which you are plunging, and drawing after you the Government of your Country.

Conscription is chosen as the most promising instrument, both of overcoming reluctance to the Service, and of subduing the difficulties which arise from the deficiencies of the Exchequer. The administration asserts the right to fill the ranks of the regular army by compulsion. It contends that it may now take one out of every twenty-five men, and any part or the whole of the rest, whenever its occasions require. Persons thus taken by force, and put into an army, may be compelled to serve there, during the war, or for life. They may be put on any service, at home or abroad, for defence or for invasion, according to the will and pleasure of Government. This power does not grow out of any invasion of the country, or even out of a state of war. It belongs to Government at all times, in peace as well as in war, and is to be exercised under all circumstances, according to its mere discretion. This, Sir, is the amount of the principle contended for by the Secretary of War (James Monroe).

Is this, Sir, consistent with the character of a free Government? Is this civil liberty? Is this the real character of our Constitution? No, Sir, indeed it is not. The Constitution is libelled, foully libelled. The people of this country have not established for themselves such a fabric of despotism. They have not purchased at a vast expense of their own treasure and their own blood a Magna Carta to be slaves. Where is it written in the Constitution, in what article or section is it contained, that you may take children from their parents, and parents from their children, and compel them to fight the battles of any war, in which the folly or the wickedness of Government may engage it? Under what concealment has this power lain hidden, which now for the first time comes forth, with a tremendous and baleful aspect, to trample down and destroy the dearest rights of personal liberty? Sir, I almost disdain to go to quotations and references to prove that such an abominable doctrine has no foundation in the Constitution of the country. It is enough to know that that instrument was intended as the basis of a free Government, and that the power contended for is incompatible with any notion of personal liberty. An attempt to maintain this doctrine upon the provisions of the Constitution is an exercise of perverse ingenuity to extract slavery from the substance of a free Government. It is an attempt to show, by proof and argument, that we ourselves are subjects of despotism, and that we have a right to chains and bondage, firmly secured to us and our children, by the provisions of our Government.

The supporters of the measures before us act on the principle that it is their task to raise arbitrary powers, by construction, out of a plain written charter of National Liberty. It is their pleasing duty to free us of the delusion, which we have fondly cherished, that we are the subjects of a mild, free and limited Government, and to demonstrate by a regular chain of premises and conclusions, that Government possesses over us a power more tyrannical, more arbitrary, more dangerous, more allied to blood and murder, more full of every form of mischief, more productive of every sort and degree of misery, than has been exercised by any civilized Government in modern times.

But it is said, that it might happen that any army would not be raised by voluntary enlistment, in which case the power to raise armies would be granted in vain, unless they might be raised by compulsion. If this reasoning could prove any thing, it would equally show, that whenever the legitimate powers of the Constitution should be so badly administered as to cease to answer the great ends intended by them, such new powers may be assumed or usurped, as any existing administration may deem expedient. This is a result of his own reasoning, to which the Secretary does not profess to go. But it is a true result. For if it is to be assumed, that all powers were granted, which might by possibility become necessary, and that Government itself is the judge of this possible necessity, then the powers of Government are precisely what it chooses they should be.

The tyranny of Arbitrary Government consists as much in its means as in its end; and it would be a ridiculous and absurd constitution which should be less cautious to guard against abuses in the one case than in the other. All the means and instruments which a free Government exercises, as well as the ends and objects which it pursues, are to partake of its own essential character, and to be conformed to its genuine spirit. A free Government with arbitrary means to administer it is a contradiction; a free Government without adequate provision for personal security is an absurdity; a free Government, with an, uncontrolled power of military conscription, is a solecism, at once the most ridiculous and abominable that ever entered into the head of man.

Into the paradise of domestic life you enter, not indeed by temptations and sorceries, but by open force and violence.

Nor is it, Sir, for the defense of his own house and home, that he who is the subject of military draft is to perform the task allotted to him. You will put him upon a service equally foreign to his interests and abhorrent to his feelings. With his aid you are to push your purposes of conquest. The battles which he is to fight are the battles of invasion; battles which he detests perhaps and abhors, less from the danger and the death that gather over them, and the blood with which they drench the plain, than from the principles in which they have their origin. If, Sir, in this strife he fall—if, while ready to obey every rightful command of Government, he is forced from home against right, not to contend for the defense of his country, but to prosecute a miserable and detestable project of invasion, and in that strife he fall, 'tis murder. It may stalk above the cognizance of human law, but in the sight of Heaven it is murder; and though millions of years may roll away, while his ashes and yours lie mingled together in the earth, the day will yet come, when his spirit and the spirits of his children must be met at the bar of ominipotent justice. May God, in his compassion, shield me from any participation in the enormity of this guilt.

A military force cannot be raised, in this manner, but by the means of a military force. If administration has found that it can not form an army without conscription, it will find, if it venture on these experiments, that it can not enforce conscription without an army. The Government was not constituted for such purposes. Framed in the spirit of liberty, and in the love of peace, it has no powers which render it able to enforce such laws. The attempt, if we rashly make it, will fail; and having already thrown away our peace, we may thereby throw away our Government.

I express these sentiments here, Sir, because I shall express them to my constituents. Both they and myself live under a Constitution which teaches us, that "the doctrine of non-resistance against arbitrary power and oppression, is absurd, slavish, and destructive of the good and happiness of mankind." With the same earnestness with which I now exhort you to forbear from these measures, I shall exhort them to exercise their unquestionable right of providing for the security of their own liberties.

NATIONAL MILITARY APPRECIATION MONTH

HON. MELISSA A. HART

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Ms. HART. Mr. Speaker, a recent USO/NFL tour to U.S. Army bases throughout Germany served as a fresh reminder of the invaluable service the men and women of the U.S. armed forces are providing to our nation. NFL Commissioner Paul Tagliabue, Pittsburgh Steelers running back Jerome Bettis and Tennessee Titans running back Eddie George met with U.S. troops to convey America's gratitude for all of the their service.

May is National Military Appreciation Month. This is a time when we recognize and honor our nation's 1.4 million highly-trained, active duty soldiers, sailors, airmen and Marines. These brave Americans voluntarily put their lives on the line so you and I can live in peace and freedom.

We owe these heroes our active appreciation and support as they fight to preserve democracy.

We share the sentiments Commissioner Tagliabue conveyed to our armed forces: "So long as [our troops] are on the from lines, [we should] make sure [they] remain on the front page."

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to insert in the RECORD several news accounts of this important and noteworthy event.

BETTIS SALUTES USA'S REAL HEROES

(By Jon Saraceno)

While wondering how Cleveland Browns fans will ease the pain now that cult hero Ben Gay is gone. . . .

Jerome Bettis is better known as the Bus, but this week he was into tanks and heavy artillery.

The Pittsburgh Steelers' rumbling running back accompanied NFL Commissioner Paul Tagliabue on Thursday to Germany, where they visited with U.S. forces on two military bases. Bettis flew in a black-hawk helicopter and spent time inside an M1–A1 Abrams tank. Tennessee's Eddie George will join them Friday as part of the league's Armed Forces Weekend, which includes an NFL Europe game.

"I want our servicemen to understand we care," Bettis said from overseas. "We appreciate what they're doing to guarantee our freedoms."

The trio will visit Landstuhl Regional Medical Center, where U.S. troops hurt in Afghanistan recuperate.

"It puts my job into perspective," Bettis said. "I guess I'm considered a hero of sorts, but I'm only a football player. The guys on the front lines are the real heroes. This is not some commercial you see where guys are jumping out of helicopters doing pretty stuff. This is real." . . .

AT LAST, THE BUS MEETS THE TANK

(By Ed Bouchette)

The Bus climbed inside a tank yesterday, and, along the way, Jerome Bettis confirmed that the patriots are mostly the good guys.

"It's incredible to see the troops and their daily living," Bettis said yesterday from Frankfurt, Germany, where he was part of a four-day USO/NFL tour of U.S. military bases.

Earlier, he rode in an Abrams M1A12, and, if only someone had made the connection earlier, Bettis might be known as The Tank today.

"I've been interested in that tank because my middle name is Abram," Bettis said. "Knowing about that tank and actually seeing it, getting into it and finding out that a tank can go 55 miles per hour with all the armor and everything . . ."

But what about its 40 time?

"That's a great question," Bettis said. "I should have asked."

No one's asking Bettis about his own time in the 40 lately. He resumed running only last week for the first time since he gained 8 yards on 9 carries in the Steelers' 24–17 AFC championship loss to the New England Patriots at Heinz Field. Bettis missed the previous six games with a groin injury.

It has left some people questioning whether he can keep going as he enters his 10th NFL season after celebrating his 30th birthday. He was leading the NFL with 1,072 yards in the 11th game—and climbed to 12th on the all-time list with 10,876 yards—when he was hurt.

Let there be doubters, Bettis said from Germany.

"It'll be 10 years this year; I don't think I have to prove anything," Bettis said. "I just need to be 100 percent healthy, go out there and duplicate what I did last year. Everybody knows what I'm capable of. I'm not really worried about that at all."

"I'm used to that. Going into every season, the questions have always been about me, and I've always proved everybody wrong, I'm not really concerned about it. If people are concerned about me and my ability to go out there and play, they just need to check my track record. This is something I've been doing a long time."

Bettis has never failed to reach 1,000 yards in his six seasons with the Steelers and missed it only once in his three with the Rams. Until last season, he had missed only three games in his career. He is the NFL's second-leading rusher behind Emmitt Smith of Dallas, and he could reasonably become the NFL's ninth-leading rusher by the end of the season. He needs just 361 yards to surpass O.J. Simpson.

Bettis overcame a more serious groin injury at the end of the 1996 season and came back to have his career high in 1997 with 1,665 yards. But then, he was 25.

"Yeah, it's an injury that I've had to scrap and battle back from" Bettis said, "Fortunately for me, I've had the time to get healthy. And so, that's what I'm doing. There's no reason to rush back and jump back on the field for nothing. We don't play a game until September, so I don't plan to be doing that much crazy stuff until training camp."

Bettis was heading for another 350-carry season when he was hurt. He had 375 carries in 1997 and 355 in 2000, his two highest. Those days might be over. The Steelers would like to boost the number of times Amos Zereoue runs with the ball. Bettis welcomes it.

"That would be a great opportunity to increase this offense," Bettis said. "It's all about the team at this point. Hopefully, he will get opportunities. When I was in there [last year], he was getting more and more opportunities. I don't think anything's going to change."

"I encourage that, plus it helps me out. I don't have to take it 30, 35 times. The old man can't do that all the time anymore. That was the plan last year, and it was working. Unfortunately, I just didn't hold up my part of the deal."

Today, Bettis will join Titans halfback Eddie George and NFL Commissioner Paul Tagliabue on a visit to the Landstuhl Regional Medical Center, where many U.S. soldiers with more than groin injuries from the fighting in Afghanistan are recuperating.

Bettis anticipated the visit as much as he does running on Monday Night Football.

"I'm just looking forward to saying thank you. My goal was just to shake as many hands as I could, say as many thank yous as I could and kind of express the thoughts and minds of all the Americans back home that, hey, we're with you guys, we're not abandoning you guys, we're living it with you"

"So many times, you never get the appreciation. I wanted to say thank you, we appreciate you for what you're doing for us."

NFL GOES LONG ON PROMISE TO DONATE GEAR TO MILITARY

(By Kevin Dougherty)

WIESBADEN, GERMANY.—People often make promises, and a good number of them honor the pledges. But enough, more than enough, don't.

So when NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue said during a visit last month to a U.S. Army base in Germany that he wanted "to do something for these people," folks smiled, nodded and didn't dwell on it for too long.

Roughly two weeks later, Gail Camillo, USO-Europe's regional director, got a call from the commissioner's office. The message: Huddle together and figure out how many pigskins and how much flag football equipment you think you need.

"This shows where their heart is, and that they appreciate us," Army Sgt. Major Edward Faust said Thursday, as Tagliabue worked his way to a podium for a ceremonial handoff of gridiron equipment.

Military communities throughout Germany scored big Thursday when the NFL donated 1,405 footballs to unit, youth services and DODDS football teams and programs. In addition to the footballs, the league donated 8,825 pairs of flags for flag football and 5,224 cones to mark boundaries or for use in drills.

The equipment is going to be distributed to Army and Air Force installations across Europe. The USO will pass the goods to unit level football teams, youth services leagues—flag as well as tackle—and to Department of Defense Dependents Schools.

In all, 664 teams will benefit from the gift.

"Any donation like this really helps us out as far as the bottom line," said Air Force Col. Al Swain, the director of staff for U.S. Air Forces in Europe.

Tagliabue made the presentation at the Wiesbaden Army Airfield, the site of his March visit. He was joined by Pittsburgh Steelers running back Jerome Bettis. Tennessee Titans running back Eddie George is scheduled to catch up with the group Friday, which will conduct visits with troops in Kaiserslautern, Hanau, Landstuhl and Baumbolder. Their tour includes a morning stop at the Landstuhl Regional Medical Center and a meeting with troops injured in Operation Enduring Freedom.

"So long as you are on the front lines," Tagliabue said, "we in the NFL will make sure you remain on the front page."

STUDENT CONGRESSIONAL TOWN MEETING

HON. BERNARD SANDERS

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. Speaker, today, I recognize the outstanding work done by participants in my Student Congressional Town Meeting held this spring at the University of Vermont. These participants were part of a group of high school students from around Vermont who testified about the concerns they have as teenagers, and about what they would like to see government do regarding these concerns.

Regarding Necessity of Amtrak

(By Joseph Ferris)

Thank you for allowing me to speak here.

In the winter of 1997, Congress withheld $2.2 billion from Amtrak, that had already been promised. Eventually, Congress allocated the money to Amtrak, with the stipulation that Amtrak achieve self-sufficiency by 2002. It is now 2002, and Amtrak has yet to attain self-sufficiency, and several congressional leaders, as well as the Amtrak Reform Council, are calling for the privatization. In the following minutes, I will explain to what the failures of achieving self-sufficiency can be attributed, and why such a radical idea such as privatization is unnecessary for Amtrak.

First, the costs to run Amtrak are astronomical. It costs $3 million a year to maintain stations, tunnels and rails at operational conditions. Since 1997, there has been a $5.8 billion backlog in work, in yards, equipment and technology. Also, Amtrak pays $400 million to $600 million a year to freight rail companies to use their tracks outside of the northeast corridor.

The funds Amtrak needs are $20 billion to repair the century-and-a-half old East River and Hudson River tunnels that enter into Penn Station. Also, several billion dollars to implement the security systems necessary after September 11th. And also, in the fiscal year of 2003, Amtrak needs $1.2 billion to operate long-distance trains along with other routes.

Now the money Amtrak is actually given over their 31 years history is trifling compared to the money that government doles out to airports and roads in a singular year. Over 30 years, Amtrak has been given a total of $23 billion. last year Amtrak got $560 million, compared to 13 billion for airports and 33 billion for roads. Airlines received massive bailouts after September 11th. Amtrak was given only a token $100 million for security.

Amtrak right now is caught in catch-22. It needs money to fix rails and crumbling infrastructure, but Congress won't give money to something they don't think will be around in a few years. Therefore, the following happens. Even though new trains, such as the Excel Express, are running, old rails only allow it to run at top speed for 18 miles of the 452-mile run from Boston to DC. Amtrak could be making money if the 2001 High-Speed Rail Initiative had not been killed in Congress. And also, a bill allowing for tax-exempt bonds, and loan guarantees for construction was pushed through the House and Senate.

Also, there is a severe philosophical and policy planning issue in Washington, DC right now. Though several national agencies are involved, none has ever set a policy path for Amtrak. Second, Amtrak has never had a dedicated source of funding that they could build around. Also, Congress expects Amtrak to make a profit, while history clearly indicates the exact opposite. Passenger rail was never a moneymaker. Even the New York Central in its heyday, with the Twentieth Century Limited, lost money on each passenger per mile. Even the European high-speed lines, which are heralded as blueprints for privatization, are money-losers. Thus, it would be ludicrous for Amtrak, which suffers from a fundamental problem—underinvestment—to then be expected to turn a tidy profit. Even though Amtrak's funding has been severely reduced, there are many positive signs that need to be highlighted before a decision about Amtrak's fate is made.

But first, right now, the status quo: We have wing-lock, gridlock, air congestion, rising gas prices, and in some major metropolitan cities, six-hour long rush hours. Also, airplanes release poisonous toxins into the upper atmosphere at rates astronomical compared to what trains release.

Also, rail works. It's the safest and most reliable transportation system during storms. In the past decade, light rail and freight expansion have worked. Also, passenger trains are two to eight times more fuel-efficient than planes, and much more economical.

The Pacific Northwest Corridor, which is run by Amtrak and the state governments of Oregon and Washington, has seen a dramatic increase over the past decade, after infusion of state money was allowed to build a high-speed rail corridor. Also, sleeping cars, which are often referred to as archaic, and for train-bus alone, experienced an increase of 19 percent over last year's statistics. February of 2002 was the sixth straight month that rail ridership was up and air ridership went down.

Amtrak handles 40 percent of all traffic in the New York-Washington, DC, corridor. If high-speed rail corridors were developed in Florida, the southeast and Texas, per se, they could garner up to 20 to 30 percent of all traffic in that area. Ridership from 1978 to 2001 increased 24 percent, while funding was drastically cut by almost 80 percent.

What should be done? I believe a one-cent tax should be instituted on all gasoline purchases, as well as a one-and-a-half cent tax on all domestic airplane tickets, which would give Amtrak a sustained source of income coming out to about $3.1 billion a year.

Also, Amtrak should be given $50 billion grants spread over two years to replace antiquated signals, rails, equipment and technology. Congress shall reintroduce the $12 billion high-speed rail initiative, and will follow the DOT's report on high-speed rail corridors, which indoctrinated eleven corridors in 33 states. A system of 80 percent matching funds will be established to match funds invested by state and local government; because, right now, states and local governments get zero percent matching funds, while for highway they get almost a hundred percent.

An independent committee will be formed to find timesaving and performance-enhancing changes, such as customs agents will be put aboard international trains, and will check passenger IDs at each respective station that the passenger gets on, instead of at the border, which causes a backlog of about three hours.

Also, mail cars, which in the status quo are put on after the train is boarded in the yard, which costs another two hours for each train, will now be added to the train when it is put together in the yard, so there will be a flow from the station to point B.

Thank you very much.

Regarding Child Labor

(By Colin Robinson, Marcia Lo Monoco, Sarah Kunz, and Delia Kipp)

COLIN ROBINSON. Good morning, Congressman Sanders and Professor Gutman.

Our testimony is going to begin with a description of the problem of child labor, and then we're going to move on to an explanation of the causes of child labor, then possible solutions, and wrapping up with what the Child Labor Education Act, CLEA, has done in Guatemala.

MARCIA LO MONOCO. Exploitative child labor is when children work under conditions that are hazardous to their physical and/or mental health, when they are deprived of an opportunity to get an education, and not paid a liveable wage. Once children begin to work, sometimes as early as the age of 4, their chances to change the future are very small.

It is common to think that child labor is a problem in Third World countries, but it is also a very real problem in the United States. One million children in the U.S. pick the produce we eat every day. There are an estimated 250,000 sweat shops in American cities. But child labor is a global problem.

The most prevalent type of child labor is agricultural work. Children work in fields for long, hard hours, and are exposed to hazardous chemicals. Children also work in manufacturing, construction, mining, the sex trade, and bonded labor. Bonded labor is when children are sold by their parents to manufacturers, where they are sometimes chained to their machines or locked in workrooms. Child labor is a global problem which prevents educational opportunities and continues the cycle of poverty and deprivation.

SARAH KUNZ. Child labor is one of the most heinous human rights violations occurring today. It can be thought of as a fire sparked by the oppressive cyclical nature of capitalism and fueled by corporate greed and corporate imperialism. American megacorporations such as Nike, Disney and Universityware exploit Third World economies through promises of mass employment. Instead, mass poverty ensues, due to subpoverty wages.

The frightening phenomenon that is globalization creates homogenous global markets driven by low wages and high profit margins. New global trade agreements and organizations such as NAFTA, WTO, the IMF, and pending free-trade areas of the Americas in effect declare labor laws barriers to trade. Union-busting in sweat shops, mines and fields all around the world destroy democratic principles at their roots.

The oppressive nature of capitalism inherently creates such conditions as poverty and inopportunity. The child population is easily manipulated and often exemplifies the most desperate of the human condition. Due to the plight of the economically distressed, many children have no other choice than to work.

COLIN ROBINSON. The issue of a solution to child labor is one that is intimately intertwined with the global economy. However, the exploitation and abuse of innocent children cannot be outrightly ignored. A solution will come out of hard work and education. We must educate people about the human rights abuses, about the four-year-olds carrying twenty pounds of bricks, about the young boys and girls forced to work the streets, selling their bodies for sex. We need to create a conscious consumer, starting at a young age, a consumer who will think twice before buying goods made by children.

Furthermore, we must appeal to lawmakers, lobbyists and corporate officers to instate rules giving children their rights. Through letters, we have a voice. The 1998 bonded labor act, written by you, Congressman Sanders, was the first step in this branch of change. Finally, the fortunate youth of the industrialized world can unite to help their distant peers. Through student organizations like ours, CLEA, Child Labor Education in Action, the youth have a voice. It gives them a pulpit from which would be heard.

The child laborers of our world need a voice. So educate yourself and speak out.

DELIA KIPP. In April of 2001, sixteen students from Child Labor Education in Action traveled to Pasac Segundo in western highlands of Guatemala. The people of the Pasac

Segundo are Mayans and victims of extraordinary poverty. This is an agricultural community, and here is where the children work, in the fields surrounding their homes. This is a place where the land is rich and the people are poor.

The children of the Pasac Segundo had no way of breaking the vicious poverty cycle until two years ago, when their parents and other community members joined together to start a school. We went to Pasac Segundo to help them build a new school. Alongside adults and children of the village, we cleared the land of stone and leveled the ground. We dug foundations and constructed rebar frames to reinforce cement and bricks.

We left with unbreakable ties and eagerness to continue to support the school. We have continued to fund-raise during the past school year. We held concerts, a benefit dinner, as well as many other successful activities. In total, we have given Pasac Segundo over $6,000. In conjunction with many area elementary and high schools, we have collected school, health supplies, and shoes for children of Pasac Segundo. We are extremely excited and proud to announce that the school in Guatemala should be finished by the end of this month. We also invite students to learn more about our building project in Guatemala and our organization by visiting table in lobby or http://www.clea.sit.edu.

COLIN ROBINSON. And I'd like to thank you, Congressman Sanders, for allowing us to be here.

EXPRESSING SOLIDARITY WITH ISRAEL IN ITS FIGHT AGAINST TERRORISM

SPEECH OF

HON. MICHAEL M. HONDA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 2002

Mr. HONDA. Mr. Speaker, I come to the floor of the House of Representatives today in the name of democracy, in the name of hope, and in the name of peace.

As long-standing supporters of Israel, we recognize and respect Israel's unquestioned right to self-defense.

The United States has a long history of promoting and supporting democracies. It has long considered Israel its closest ally in the Middle East, because Israel is a democracy.

It is because of our passion for democracy that we cast votes against the procedural steps needed to bring House Resolution 392 to the floor.

These procedural steps prevented any amendments or any substitute resolutions to be considered by the Congress. We were not permitted to consider or debate either Senator LIEBERMAN's or Congressman DEFAZIO's language.

We were not given the opportunity to meet with our constituents and hear their thoughts and concerns on this divisive and complicated matter. Nor were there any hearings on this resolution. This is wrong and does not speak to debate that is central to our democratic process.

While we support House Resolution 392 in its final form, we have concerns that this resolution presents a one-sided view of a many-sided reality.

We cannot ignore the suffering of the Palestinian people and the loss of innocent civilians.

We cannot ignore the economic hardship the Palestinians have endured as they continue their attempts to create their own Democratic nation.

And we cannot ignore the physical damage done to Palestinian infrastructure in Jenin, in Ramallah and other towns in the West Bank.

Even with the Resolution's shortcomings, we believe it is critical to speak out against acts of terrorism that have claimed the lives of thousands of innocent Israeli civilians.

The United States is scarred by its own September 11 experience and we have a new and somber national consciousness of terrorism on our soil.

We continue to hold out hope that the Israelis and the Palestinians will be able to achieve the peace of the brave that has proven so elusive. We are confident that the United States will be a true partner for peace and help bring a 21st Century Marshall Plan of resources and hope to those who today carry a rage of desperation.

YUCCA MOUNTAIN REPOSITORY SITE APPROVAL ACT

SPEECH OF

HON. LYNN C. WOOLSEY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 2002

Ms. WOOLSEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong opposition to this resolution to allow nuclear waste to be deposited at Yucca Mountain. And, I commend my colleague, Rep. SHELLEY BERKLEY, for her leadership on this issue.

The nuclear power industry and its White House allies are licking their chops at the prospect that Yucca Mountain will be approved as a dump site. They will try to sell this development as proof that the issue of nuclear waste has been solved, While the industry may claim that nuclear power and its waste are safe, the fact remains that Americans don't agree. They understand that nuclear waste management will continue to be a cause for concern even if the Yucca Mountain site is approved.

Burying radioactive nuclear waste is a bad idea . . . whether in Nevada or somewhere else. Aside from exposing Nevadans to the unknown effects of having radioactive waste in their backyard, the current plan will put our entire country at risk as waste travels through communities to reach the dump site. Accidents happen in every industry, but nowhere else are the consequences so severe, and so far-reaching as in the nuclear industry. The undeniable truth is that transporting waste over road or rail in order to bury it involves great, unjustifiable risks to human health and the environment. Even worse, the risks have only increased since September 11 as no one can deny that a traveling caravan of nuclear waste would be a prime terrorist target.

For these reasons, I urge my colleagues to vote against H.J. Res. 87.

HONORING THE DISTINGUISHED PUBLIC SERVICE OF RICHARD REEVES

HON. BART GORDON

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the outstanding public service of a good friend of mine, Richard Reeves. Richard has served on my hometown of Murfreesboro's City Council for 22 years, the last four years of which he served as mayor. Richard, however, has decided to retire from public service after a long and honorable career.

During his more than two decades on the City Council, Richard has helped guide the Middle Tennessee city to prominence. Murfreesboro is home to a number of successful industries and one of the best universities in the nation, Middle Tennessee State University, my alma mater. Not only has the university flourished, but so has the city as a whole, with a population that has more than doubled in two decades. Richard can take credit for a lot of that success.

Despite his primary occupation as a successful businessman, Richard found time to serve Murfreesboro with distinction. He put in countless, and often thankless, hours helping city leaders make Murfreesboro a better place to live and work. Murfreesboro's quality of life is second to none. We have excellent schools, great parks—including the Stones River National Battlefield and Greenway—and good-paying jobs.

The people of Murfreesboro, Tennessee, could not have asked for a more dedicated public servant. His leadership and work ethic will be missed at City Hall. I cordially congratulate Richard on his distinguished career as a public servant and wish him well in future endeavors.

HONORING JOHN J. DIETZ OF METROPOLITAN NASHVILLE-DAVIDSON COUNTY PUBLIC SCHOOLS

HON. BOB CLEMENT

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. CLEMENT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Mr. John J. Dietz of the Metropolitan Nashville-Davidson County Public School System. He is leaving his position this month in order to move closer to his family in Michigan.

As Deputy Director and Executive for Business and Auxiliary Services with the school system, Dietz has guided the business and financial matters for the district since 1994.

He is widely known and respected for his honesty, good character, and his careful and conservative fiscal management, as well as his dedication to serving the community and the district's 69,000 students.

Dietz and his wife Wendy have both contributed greatly to the school district—he in administrative services, and she, as a Metro teacher. A history buff, he enjoys reading and researching the Civil War during his leisure time.

He will take a new position next month as business manager for the Rochester, Michigan public schools. Dietz is to be commended for his outstanding efforts on behalf of the citizens of the 5th Congressional District through his professionalism and integrity. May he enjoy success in all of his future endeavors.

HONORING GARY POWERS, JR. FOR HIS DEDICATION TO BRINGING THE COLD WAR MUSEUM TO NORTHERN VIRGINIA

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. TOM DAVIS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to Mr. Gary Powers, Jr. for his work and dedication to bringing the Cold War Museum to Northern Virginia. In honor of his father, Mr. Gary Powers, Sr., Powers spent years to not only gain deserved recognition for his father, but for all who defended the United States and her allies during the Cold War.

Powers' father, Mr. Gary Powers, Sr., was a Korean War veteran who, in the 1960s, worked for the Central Intelligence Agency. In 1960, he was shot down over the USSR while piloting a U–2 spy plane and was convicted of spying and confined to a Russian prison until exchanged for a captured Russian spy. He subsequently found employment as a helicopter pilot for television station KNBC in Los Angeles. He died on August 1, 1977 in the crash of his helicopter and was buried in Section 11 of Arlington National Cemetery.

In 1962, espionage became big news as the "U2 Incident" grabbed world headlines. Powers was shot down as he flew the U–2, designed for covert surveillance, over Soviet territory, sparking one of the biggest international crises of the Cold War. The U.S. demanded his safe return. The USSR wanted to know what he was doing up there in the first place.

Shot down on May 1, 1960, Powers was held in prison for 2 years until 1962, when he was exchanged for Soviet Col. Rudolf Abel in the most dramatic East-West spy swap ever to occur in Cold War Berlin. Powers stepped on to the eastern end of the Berlin's Glienicke Bridge spanning the River Havel on February 10, 1962. At the other end of the bridge stood Colonel Rudolf Abel, a heavily muffled Soviet master-spy, seized earlier by U.S. security agents after setting up a Red spy network in New York in the late 1950s.

At a precisely arranged signal, the two men strode on to the bridge, marching purposefully towards one another, Powers heading west, Abel east. In the middle of the bridge they passed each other silently, with barely a nod of their heads. That spy-swap operation was to be the forerunner of many such East-West prisoner exchanges to take place on the Glienicke Bridge over the next 27 years in Berlin.

Criticized when he returned to the United States for not ensuring the revolutionary plane was destroyed or killing himself with poison, Powers was cold-shouldered by his former employers at the Central Intelligence Agency and eventually died in 1977 at the age of 47 when a television news helicopter he was piloting crashed in Los Angeles.

On May 1, 2000, U.S. officials presented Powers' family with the Prisoner-of-War Medal, the Distinguished Flying Cross and the National Defense Service Medal during a ceremony held at the Beale Air Force Base, north of Sacramento, and home to the modern U.S. U–2 force. It marked the 40th anniversary of the incident.

Powers' son, Gary Powers Jr., spent years writing letters and holding meetings with officials to ensure this very deserved recognition took place. He saw the presentation of the medals as an important step in recognizing those who served their country during the Cold War. Powers wanted to make sure that his father was honored with the medals he deserved for being a prisoner of war, while at the same time ensuring those who served along with his father were recognized as well.

Powers, Jr., has devoted much of his time to seeing his father's memory honored, and has worked endlessly to establish a permanent Cold War Museum to educate the public about the period of US-Soviet rivalry. As a direct result of all of his hard work and dedication, Northern Virginia will be the location for the new Cold War Museum.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, I wish to congratulate and honor Mr. Powers, Jr., for his dedication to his father, to all Cold War veterans, to Northern Virginia, and to the nation. He certainly has earned this recognition, and I call upon all of my colleagues to join me in applauding this remarkable man.

EXPRESSING SOLIDARITY WITH ISRAEL IN ITS FIGHT AGAINST TERRORISM

SPEECH OF

HON. ANNA G. ESHOO

KEN KERNSTOCK: HELPING ARENAC COUNTY GROW

HON. JAMES A. BARCIA

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. BARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Ken Kernstock upon his retirement after 21 years as the Arenac County, Michigan, Extension Director. Ken's exemplary work as an educator on agricultural issues has had a tremendously positive impact on the farming community and the learning seeds he has planted with future farmers will reap benefits for Arenac County for generations. Ken's wife, Kay, their son, Robert, and daughters, Linda and Sandra, also deserve high praise for their unselfish support of Ken's career.

After earning a bachelor's degree in agricultural education and a master's degree in vocational education from Michigan State University, Ken taught high school before beginning his career as an agricultural agent and district farm management agent with the MSU Extension in 1976. In 1981, Ken earned an appointment as the Arenac County Extension Director, a post he held until his retirement this year. Throughout his tenure, Ken used his extensive skills to implement and hone many educational programs for the agricultural community. Ken has consistently gone above and beyond the requirements of his job to reach out to hard-working farm families and others.

Growers often point to the many workshops and studies Ken undertook to improve farming techniques and assist farmers in finding new methods to increase efficiency and productivity. Ken modestly credits others for his success, but he has clearly been the engine that drove the Extension for many years. In particular, he worked with the crops and soil department on a three-year plant food study that demonstrated the effectiveness of fertilizer recommendations based on soil samples. He also organized numerous workshops and co-chaired an agricultural study tour of Mexico.

Ken also has been a sparkplug in the economic growth of the area by training future leaders and encouraging development. He organized and ran several leadership development programs, including one that led to the reactivation of the Arenac County Economic Development Corporation. In addition, he was instrumental in conducting county-wide assessments and he led the Arenac County Strategic Planning process. Ken's dedication and hard work also made a real difference in assisting local businesses in entrepreneurial training.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in expressing gratitude to Ken Kernstock for his distinguished service and in wishing him success in all future endeavors. I am confident that the seeds he sowed on behalf of the agricultural community in Arenac County and throughout the state will continue to bear fruit for many years to come.

TRIBUTE TO GEORGE J. HOMCY

HON. BILL PASCRELL, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. PASCRELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to your attention the work of an outstanding individual, Mr. George J. Homcy, President of the North Jersey Regional Chamber of Commerce. On Wednesday, May 7, 2002 he was honored at a dinner commemorating his career of service.

It is only fitting that he be honored, in this, the permanent record of the greatest freely elected body on earth, for his steadfast leadership in fostering economic growth in our region.

George Homcy's distinguished professional career began as a reporter with the Paterson Evening News in the late 1940s. He later moved to the American Forces Network as a journalist and broadcaster, covering American troop actions from the ground in Frankfurt, Munich, and Bremerhaven, Germany.

Upon his return home, George began twenty years as a reporter and eventually editor with the Herald News, located in Passaic, New Jersey.

In 1974, George Homcy began his work promoting the interests of the New Jersey business community. From 1974 to 1979, George serve as Executive Vice President of the Clifton Chamber of Commerce. In 1980, through the foresight of George and others, the Clifton Chamber merged with the Passaic Area Chamber. As President of this newly formed organization, George continued the Chamber's growth by engineering another merger with the Passaic Valley Chambers of Commerce, forming the North Jersey Regional Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. Speaker, everyone in the chamber knows that small businesses have been the backbone of our nation's economy for over 200 years. George's stewardship of the North Jersey Chamber of Commerce has had an enduring impact on numerous New Jersey small businesses.

George J. Homcy's commitment to improving the lives of those in his community extends far beyond his work with the Chamber of Commerce. A board member with the United Way of Passaic Valley, the Boys' and Girls' Club of Clifton, and Saint Mary's Hospital in Passaic, George has touched countless lives. I am far from the first person to admire George's talent, as the New Jersey Supreme Court appointed him to the Passaic County District XI Ethics Committee.

While his retirement as President of the North Jersey Chamber will cause great sadness, it also is a time for celebration, as all those touched by George will honor him. I can say without hesitation that I am proud to represent George Homcy in Congress, but more importantly, I am honored to call him my friend.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that you join our colleagues, the North Jersey Regional Chamber of Commerce, George's family and friends, and me in recognizing the outstanding and invaluable efforts of George J. Homcy.

HONORING THE MEMORY OF HARRIETTE GLASNER

HON. ALCEE L. HASTINGS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. HASTINGS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in the memory of Mrs. Harriette Glasner.

For those of us who have dedicated our lives to progressive causes, we have suffered a great loss with the passing of South Florida legend Harriette Glasner. Mrs. Glasner founded ten major social, cultural and human rights organizations. Among those she founded or co-founded are the Palm Beach County chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union, as well as the Urban League. For fifty years, Mrs. Glasner dedicated her life to the betterment of our society.

Harriette Glasner worked tirelessly for the desegregation of schools and colleges, lending financial assistance as well as her time and energy to the legal fight. She was also an early campaigner for the expansion of women's rights. Along the way, she founded the area's first Planned Parenthood office. Well-known among people active in the civil rights movement, Harriette truly never gave up and never gave in. Generations of South Floridians owe her a debt of gratitude. Her determination to fight for the rights of the poor and underprivileged and minorities have made our state and nation better places to live.

I knew Harriette Glasner through our work with the ACLU and the battles for integration. I will always remember her kind heart, keen intelligence and her selfless devotion to the many causes that have made our nation the great place it is today.

Mr. Speaker, while Harriette's passing will leave a huge hole in the front line of many progressive battles, I know the gap will be quickly filled by people who loved and respected her and are determined to continue the fights she started. That is the best tribute that can be offered for this life very well lived.

YUCCA MOUNTAIN REPOSITORY SITE APPROVAL ACT

SPEECH OF

HON. TAMMY BALDWIN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 2002

Ms. BALDWIN. Madam Speaker, today the House will vote on H. Res. 87, which will allow the Department of Energy to move forward in the process of licensing Yucca Mountain as a repository for nuclear waste. Although I realize we must find an answer for storing all of the Nation's nuclear waste, including that in Wisconsin, I oppose this resolution for several reasons.

Over the last two decades, there have been thousands of shipments of nuclear waste on the highways and railways that crisscross America. If Yucca Mountain is granted a license to receive nuclear waste, the number of shipments could increase exponentially. This is particularly troubling because the proposed routes will pass through 44 states and over 700 counties—passing near our schools, churches, and homes, including possibly in my district. While there have been few accidents when moving waste through the U.S. to date, increasing shipments by the thousands will only increase the probability of a devastating catastrophe. The events on September 11 have shown that anything is possible, and that common mishaps are not the only aspects we should take into account when examining safety and security concerns.

Throughout the debate over Yucca Mountain, numerous questions have been raised about the lack of sound science that went in to deeming the site safe. Very early in the testing process, the DOE retroactively changed the rules for site eligibility after it became apparent that the original rules could not be met for Yucca Mountain. Ever since, the credibility of the scientific standards and evidence has gotten progressively worse. Three federal agencies have released reports about Yucca Mountain—all three reports have expressed doubts and grave concerns about the suitability of the site.

The General Accounting Office (GAO), which is the investigative office of the federal government, indicated there are more than 293 unresolved technical issues with Yucca Mountain, including how quickly the containers will leak radioactive waste, the amount and speed of water flowing through the waste area, and the likelihood of volcanic activity. The GAO has yet to get answers to the majority of these questions. I believe we have no choice but to make certain we base this decision on sound science. Nuclear waste is the most dangerous substance we have ever created and will be deadly for thousands of years. Future generations depend on us being absolutely sure Yucca Mountain is safe, and science has not concluded that as yet.

Despite the scientific uncertainties of storing and shipping nuclear waste, there has been a sense of urgency to move forward with a decision on Yucca Mountain. Unfortunately, I believe this urgency has been fueled by politics—not by policy concerns regarding nuclear waste. The Nuclear Policy Act amendments of 1987 eliminated alternative sites, and billions of dollars have been devoted to Yucca Mountain. I believe some legislators may feel there is no turning back because of the tremendous federal resources that have already been invested in the project. Money concerns should not come before any policy that could threaten public safety.

Furthermore, DOE Secretary, Spencer Abraham, has also said that a permanent site for nuclear waste will promote energy security by removing a roadblock to expanding nuclear power. This also leads me to believe that the sense of urgency is not driven by an understanding of the properties of the Yucca Mountain site, but rather larger-scale issues regarding America's overall energy policies. Approving Yucca Mountain could lead to an unfettered expansion of nuclear power at a time when I believe we can be promoting other energy sources—like renewable and alternative energy technologies—that do not have harmful bi-products and the potential for devastating long-term effects on the health of our environment and on our families.

Overall, I believe Congress is rushing to make this decision regarding Yucca Mountain a decision that our future generations may have to live with for thousands of years. It is inevitable that storing nuclear waste at Yucca Mountain will continue to be a contentious issue over the next several years as technical details are sorted out. It is my hope that an expanded national debate on this issue will eventually lead to a final decision based on the merits of sound science, rather than on political arguments or larger-scale energy policy issues.

AMERICA'S EDUCATIONAL STRENGTHS

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, in the Outlook section of the Washington Post for Sunday, May 4, Gerald Bracey, has an interesting article which makes a point that I have long thought an important one—namely, that while it has become fashionable to denigrate the quality of public education in America across the board, our country has consistently led the world economically in part because we have done so well in precisely those areas of the economy where an educated workforce is the greatest asset. And as Mr. Bracey points out, those who have argued that our entire public educational system is failing have consistently argued that is would undermined our economic performance, undeterred by the fact that our economic performance has been so good.

As Bracey's article points out, "in the early 1990s, as the economy tanked and a recession set in, many variations of a 'lousy-schools-are-producing-a-lousy-workforce-and-it's-killing-us-in-the-global-marketplace' could be heard. But these slackers somehow managed to turn things around. The American economy: 'back on top was the way the New York summed up the turnabout in February 1994 well, if the schools took the rap when they went south, surely they would be praised when the economy boomed, right? hardly.'"

As Mr. Bracey notes, we do have problems with our school systems, particularly the inequality in which many of our schools in the urban and in some rural areas fall far below standard. Clearly we have to do a better job of helping the educational system overcome the social problems that contribute to the educational difficulties that many students face, and it is our obligation as a society committed to fairness to do far more here, both in and out of school. But the general point remains—if our school system overall was doing such a poor job, it is hard to understand how our economy could be doing so well in the areas where education is key. Because this question is so central to our deliberations, I ask that Mr. Bracey's article be printed here.

WHY DO WE SCAPEGOAT THE SCHOOLS?

(By Gerald W. Bracey)

There's no pleasing some people, even when they get what they want. So why do we keep listening to them?

For almost 20 years now, some of our most prominent business leaders and politicians have sounded the same alarm about the nation's public schools. It began in earnest with that 1983 golden treasury of selected, spun and distorted education statistics, "A Nation At Risk," whose authors wrote, "If only to keep and improve on the slim competitive edge we retain in world markets, we must dedicate ourselves to the reform of our educational system. . . ." The document tightly yoked our economic position in the world to how well or poorly students bubbled in answer sheets on standardized tests.

And it continued in September 2000, when a national commission on math and science teaching headed by former Ohio senator John Glenn issued a report titled "Before It's Too Late." It asked, rhetorically, "In an integrated, global economy . . . will our children be able to compete?" The report's entirely predictable answer: Not if we don't improve schools "before it's too late" (emphasis in the original report).

So you might think that these Chicken Littles would be firing up their fax machines and e-mailing everywhere to report the following hot news from the World Economic Forum's "Global Competitiveness Report, 2001–2002": The United States ranks second in the organization's Current Competitiveness Index, trailing only Finland.

The CCI isn't just another survey. It is a sophisticated rating system derived from a wide variety of economic and other factors, including education data. And the World Economic Forum (or WEF) isn't some minor league player. Its annual conference draws a cross-section of the planet's most powerful political and business leaders—including some of the people so concerned about America's schools.

But the naysayers haven't trumpeted the CCI ranking. Indeed, I wouldn't be surprised if, sometime soon, a leading member of Congress or the business community declares that we must reform our educational system to maintain our competitive edge—or best those pesky Finns.

'Twas ever thus. Schools often takes the hit for bad turns of events, but somehow never get the credit for upturns. Remember 1957? The Russians launched Sputnik, the first man-made satellite to orbit Earth. When people asked how we could lose the race to space, public schools were an easy target. Life magazine ran a five-part series on the "Crisis in Education." Major universities assumed the role of rescuers to develop modern, challenging textbooks. In 1969, America put a man on the moon, a destination that the Russians—with their allegedly superior scientists—never reached. Did a magazine declare an end to the "crisis" in education? Do pigs fly?

I don't mean to suggest, of course, that America's public schools are perfect. The dreary state of some urban and poor rural school systems is well documented. But I've been following the angst over our competitive capabilities since the 1983 report, and I've noticed the same pattern. In the early 1990s, as the economy tanked and a recession set in, many variations of "lousy-schools-are-producing-a-lousy-workforce-and-it's-killing-us-in-the-global-marketplace" could be heard. But these slackers somehow managed to turn things around: By early 1994, many publications featured banner headlines about the recovery that later became the longest sustained period of growth in the nation's history. "The American Economy: Back on Top" was the way that the New York Times summed up the turnabout in Feb. 1994.

Well, if the schools took the rap when the economy went south, surely they would be praised when the economy boomed, right? Hardly. A mere three months after the Times story appeared, IBM CEO Louis V. Gerstner Jr., wrote an op-ed for the Times headlined "Our Schools Are Failing." They are failing, said Gerstner, because they are not producing students who can compete with their international peers.

The bashers have kept up their drumbeat. Intel CEO Craig R. Barrett, Texas Instruments CEO Thomas Engibous, State Farm Insurance CEO Edward Rust and then-Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson all took to the nation's op-ed pages in 2000 and 2001 to lament the threat that our education system poses to our competitiveness. Gerstner made an encore appearance on the Times op-ed page in March, expressing his continuing concern that our schools will "limit our competitive position in the global marketplace."

None of these fine gentlemen provided any data on the relationship between the economy's health and the performance of schools. Our long economic boom suggests there isn't one—or that our schools are better than the critics claim. But, there is a broader, more objective means of looking for any relationship. The Third International Mathematics and Science Study (TIMSS) provides test scores for 41 nations, including the United States. Thirty-eight of those countries are ranked on the World Economic Forum's CCI. It's a simple statistical matter to correlate the test scores with the CCI.

There is little correlation. The United States is 29th in mathematics, but second in competitiveness. Korea is third in mathematics, but 27th in competitiveness. And so forth. If the two lists had matched, place for place, that would produce a perfect correlation of +1.0. But because some countries are high on competitiveness and low on test scores (and vice versa), the actual correlation is +.23. In the world of statistics, this is considered quite small.

Actually, even that small correlation is misleadingly high: Seven countries are low on both variables, creating what little relationship there is. If these seven nations are removed from the calculation, the correlation between test scores and competitiveness actually becomes negative, meaning that higher test scores are slightly associated with lower competitiveness.

The education variables in the index include: the quality of schools; the TIMSS scores; the number of years of education and the proportion of the country's population attending college (these two are variables in which the United States excels); and survey rankings from executives who, the World Economic Forum claims, have "international perspectives." The WEF ranked U.S. schools 27th of the 75 nations—not exactly eyepopping, but given all of the horrible things said about American schools in the past 25 years, perhaps surprisingly high. (The United states looked particularly bad in one WEF category; the difference in quality between rich and poor schools. We finished 42nd, lower than any other developed nation. That is shameful in a country as rich as ours.)

So, if 26 nations have better schools, how did we earn our No. 2 overall competitiveness ranking? The WEF uses dozens of variables from many sectors, and the United States rates well across the board. One important consideration is the "brain drain" factor. Our scientists and engineers stay here, earning us a top ranking in this category. No other country, not even Finland, came close on this measurement.

But what really caught my eye were the top U.S. scores on a set of variables that make up what the WEF calls "National Innovation Capacity." Innovation variables are critical to competitiveness, according to the WEF. Ten years ago, the competitive edge was gained by nations that could lower costs and raise quality. Virtually all developed countries have accomplished this, the WEF report asserts, and thus "competitive advantage must come from the ability to create and then commercialize new products and processes, shifting the technology frontier as fast as rivals can catch up."

Innovation is itself a complicated affair, but my guess is that it is not linked to test scores. If anything, too much testing discourages innovative thinking.

American schools, believe it or not, have developed a culture that encourages innovative thinking. How many other cultures do that? A 2001 op-ed in The Washington Post was titled "At Least Our Kids Ask Questions." In the essay, author Amy Biancolli described her travails in trying to get Scottish students to discuss Shakespeare. She found that they weren't used to being allowed to express their opinions or having them valued. I had the same experience when I taught college students in Hong Kong. Years later, I mentioned this to a professor in Taiwan who said that even today, "professors' questions are often met with stony silence."

We take our questioning culture so much for granted that we don't even notice it until we encounter another country that doesn't have it. A 2001 New York Times article discussed, in the words of Japanese scientists, why Americans win so many Nobel prizes while the Japanese win so few. The Japanese scientists provided a number of reasons, but the one they cited as most important was peer review. Before American scientists publish their research, they submit it to the scrutiny—questioning—of other researchers. Japanese culture discourages this kind of direct confrontation; one Japanese scientist recalled his days in the United States, when he would watch scholars—good friends—engage in furious battles, challenging and testing each other's assumptions and logic. That would never happen in Japan, he told the Times reporter.

Japan's culture of cooperation and consensus makes for a more civil society than we find here, but our combative culture leaves us with an edge in creativity. We should think more than twice before we tinker too much with an educational system that encourages questioning. We won't benefit from one that idolizes high test scores.

It could put our very competitiveness as a nation at risk.

TRIBUTES TO HARRY STEPANIAN, WALTER McNAMARA, LARRY JAKUBOWICZ, AND MARTY GANNON, CLINTON, MASSACHUSETTS FIREFIGHTERS

HON. JAMES P. McGOVERN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Harry Stepanian, Walter McNamara, Larry Jakubowicz, and Marty Gannon, firefighters from the town of Clinton, Massachusetts who have announced their retirement after many years of dedicated service.

These men put their lives on the line every day to protect the citizens of Clinton. Because of their efforts through the years, many lives and a great deal of property have been saved, whether it was from entering a burning building or performing as an Emergency Medical Technician.

The town of Clinton is very fortunate to have an outstanding fire department. As we all know—and as the tragedies of September 11th reminded us—the job of a firefighter is not an easy one. It takes a special person to perform the duties required of firefighters. That duty involves risking their lives every day. Through the years, these men and their colleagues have performed admirably. Their community is grateful for their work, and so am I.

It is a pleasure to recognize these outstanding men, and I know the entire House joins me in extending our best wishes to them and to their families for a happy and healthy retirement.

H.J. RES. 87

HON. RODNEY P. FRELINGHUYSEN

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, May 8, I voted to make Yucca Mountain, a remote location in the desert of Nevada, our nation's depository for high level nuclear waste. I based my support for Yucca Mountain on a $19 billion taxpayer investment over 24 years of some of the most comprehensive scientific investigation ever conducted by our nation.

We promised the public back in 1982 in the Nuclear Waste Policy Act that the Federal Government would provide a single national repository for the quickly accumulating radioactive waste. This day has been a long time coming, and we can wait no longer.

Since the dawn of the nuclear age in the 1940s, nuclear waste has been accumulating, and it has been stored in temporary locations across the country—131 temporary sites in 39 states, including New Jersey.

Temporary storage of highly radioactive nuclear waste is dangerous—there's no two ways about it. We need a single, safe, secure location to contain spent nuclear fuel and our nation's dismantled nuclear arms. Quite simply, it is a matter of public health and safety, and it is in the best interests of our national security.

Yucca Mountain is located in the Nevada desert, some 1353 square miles of land, an area larger than the state of Rhode Island. It is remote, and had been used as a nuclear test site.

I have visited Yucca Mountain, since I serve on the Energy Appropriations Subcommittee which has been responsible for overseeing the funding of this critical project. During my inspection of the site, I was taken inside the mountain for almost five miles. I also learned that when nuclear waste is contained inside Yucca Mountain, it will be stored in tunnels 1000 feet below the desert floor. Yucca Mountain is so safe, scientists and engineers have determined that with its arid and geologically stable setting, even under the worst scenario, Yucca Mountain would meet EPA standards for radiation for 10,000 years! Clearly, Yucca Mountain will pay dividends, and then some, on the taxpayers' investment.

Nuclear energy has been proven to be an effective, safe, clean energy source. In fact, in New Jersey where there are two nuclear sites, nearly half of our state's electricity is produced by nuclear power. Nationwide, it is now the second largest source of electricity.

While nuclear energy continues to have its supporters and its critics, the fact is it is here to stay. As such, we need to deal with it, most especially radioactive waste. Yucca Mountain is the answer.

161 million Americans live within 75 miles of radioactive nuclear waste. Do we leave radioactive waste to decay in temporary storage units at hundreds of locations across the country? Do we wait for highly radioactive toxins to possibly seep into our groundwater? Do we put our national security at risk by leaving spent nuclear fuel in temporary containers?

No, we side with science. Yucca Mountain, from the standpoint of protecting the nation's health as well as our security, represents the best, most comprehensive option for containing America's nuclear waste.

We can no longer afford to wait.

SAVING AMERICA'S STEEL INDUSTRY

SPEECH OF

HON. FRANK MASCARA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 2002

Providing for disposition of H.J. Res. 84, Disapproving the action taken by the President under Section 203 of the Trade Act of 1974 transmitted to the Congress on March 5, 2002.

Mr. MASCARA. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of the rule and, more importantly, in support of our steel industry that was on the brink of collapse.

I want to use my time to address one of the most vital issues facing the industry today: legacy costs. As scores of companies have been forced to declare Chapter 11 bankruptcy since the flood of steel imports began hitting our shores in 1997, retirement promises these companies made, in many cases, have been broken. These broken promises have left many steel retirees, through no fault of their own, without the health and other benefits they had been counting on their entire working lives.

That is why I am proud to be an original cosponsor of H.R. 4646, the Steel Industry Legacy Relief Act. This groundbreaking legislation will ensure that the promises made to the thousands of steel retirees are kept.

Under this legislation, the Federal Government will create and support a program of health insurance for the retirees of steel, iron ore, and coke companies. Similar to the way the Federal Government bolstered the health care safety net for retired mine-workers, it is time for the government to step up to the plate and help steel workers.

The Administration has taken a very important first step. By imposing temporary tariffs on a broad range of steel products for up to 3 years, the Administration has given the industry an extraordinary opportunity to get back on its feet.

While the actions by the Administration were unprecedented, by themselves, they are insufficient to fully help the industry recover, We must enact H.R. 4646 into law and put the industry on a sound financial footing once and for all.

Finally, let me say, I recognize that we live in a global economy and that the United States must be economically engaged with the rest of the world. However, we must not let the ideology of free trade trump all other values and blind us to the inequities that trade imposes on many sectors of our economy.

Therefore, I urge my colleagues to vote "yes" on the rule.

RECOGNIZING THE INVALUABLE PUBLIC SERVICE OF MR. JIM CROW

HON. JOHN S. TANNER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. TANNER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in honor of my dear friend Jim Crow, whose hard work has proven invaluable, not only to the people of Shelby County and Tennessee's 8th District, but also to the state of Tennessee and indeed the nation. I have had the pleasure of working alongside Jim since before I came to Washington back in 1989. His public service stretches back even farther than that.

Jim was born in Memphis, Tennessee, in 1934. His father being in construction, the family moved where the work was—from Memphis to Ohio, then to Michigan. After also living in Fort Lauderdale, Florida, Jim moved back to Shelby County in 1959 and married Shirley Roberts the following year. They bought a house in Frayser, where their family saw the addition of two children, Elizabeth—now Elizabeth Vaughn—and James. The family relocated to Millington, Tennessee, in 1975.

Jim is retired from International Harvester, where he worked for 26 years and served as a union steward for the United Auto Workers. It was during this time that he became active in politics and the Shelby County Democratic Party.

In 1969, Jim was instrumental in helping bring my predecessor, Mr. Ed Jones, to this House of Representatives. Jim helped establish the first Congressional office in Shelby County for the 8th District and operated the office on a voluntary basis. Five years later, Mr. Jones hired Jim Crow as a field representative for Memphis and Shelby County. When I came to Washington 15 years after that, I was lucky to have Jim stay on board as a field representative, the position from which he is now retiring.

Jim has always been very active in the community, serving in such organizations as the Millington Industrial Development Board, the Millington Airport Authority, the Frayser Exchange Club, the Navy League and the Millington Chamber of Commerce, which once named him Man of the Year.

Millington was formerly home of the Navy Air Technical Training Center, but during the base restructuring in the early 1990s, that function was moved elsewhere. Jim, with his involvement in the community and on the base, followed the base's transition as it became known as Naval Support Activity Mid-South, currently housing the Navy Bureau of Personnel. As field representative, Jim was active in the communication involved with the change.

Later this month, he will retire his position as a field representative for the 8th Congressional District. He will spend more time with his family, including his grandchildren, Kali and Nicholas, and I am certain he will continue to stay active in our community.

Mr. Speaker, today I ask that you and our colleagues recognize the outstanding, selfless public service Jim has offered over the years. All the best wishes are with my friend Jim Crow as he begins an exciting new chapter in his life.

ADDRESS OF AMBASSADOR GÉZA JESZENSZKY ON THE 150TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE VISIT TO AMERICA BY HUNGARIAN DEMOCRATIC LEADER LAJOS KOSSUTH

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago the Hungarian embassy, along with the American Hungarian Federation of Metropolitan Washington, D.C., and the Hungarian Reformed Federation of America, organized a meeting to honor Lajos Kossuth, the influential Hungarian statesman and an advocate for democratic ideals in Hungary in the middle of the nineteenth century.

The event commemorated Kossuth's celebrated visit to America 150 years ago. Following an invitation from the President of the United States, Kossuth arrived in New York City on December 5, 1851, marking the beginning of a six-month tour of the country.

During his time here, Kossuth gave several hundred speeches throughout the United States, including separate addresses in both houses of Congress. Kossuth received praise by many notable American political leaders and intellectuals, including William Lloyd Garrison, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Horace Greeley, and Abraham Lincoln. In response to Kossuth's visit, approximately 250 poems, dozens of books, hundreds of pamphlets, and thousands of editorials were written about him.

Mr. Speaker, since I was born in Hungary, the legacy of Lajos Kossuth holds a special place in my heart. But by no means are the ideals and values of this noble man limited to a specific country. He devoted his life to fight for and defend democracy, freedom, and human liberties. Kossuth has been named, alongside George Washington, as a symbol of "universal human values." I do not hesitate to echo this sentiment and encourage all of us to learn more about Kossuth and the causes he held dear.

In that vein, I would like to share with my colleagues the excellent speech given by the Hungarian Ambassador to the United States Géza Jeszenszky at the event to honor Kossuth. Jeszensky's speech, entitled, "150 Years of Influence of Louis Kossuth, Governor-President of Hungary," gives an excellent overview of Kossuth's visit to the United States and its lasting influence on America. I would like to share his remarks with my colleagues, and request that they be placed in the RECORD.

150 YEARS OF INFLUENCE OF LOUIS KOSSUTH, GOVERNOR-PRESIDENT OF HUNGARY

(By Ambassador Géza Jeszenszky)

Congressman Lantos, Mrs. Lantos, Your Excellency Ambassador Poptodorova, distinguished other members of the Diplomatic Corps, Leaders of the American Hungarian community, Ladies and Gentlemen, dear Friends:

Senator Seward of New York described Kossuth in the U.S. Senate on Dec. 8, 1851 as "a personage whose name and fame at this time fills the eye and ear of the world."

Hungary had many great statesmen and other luminaries in her checkered history, but Kossuth stands out among them. Like George Washington, he was regarded as the father of the nation already in his lifetime. He was the first Hungarian political leader to make it into world history, on his visits he was admired and welcomed in England, France, the U.S. and in Italy by enthusiastic crowds. At least 100,000 turned out to great him in New York City on Broadway. He was a star matched by few politicians.

Kossuth is considered as one of the great orators of all times. He could capture his audience in Hungarian, German, Latin and English, too. He also knew a lot about the history and constitution of America. As the editor of the first popular daily newspaper in Hungary he established the reputation of the U.S. as a most successful country and a political model.

The democratic revolution in 1848, inspired and led by Kossuth, transformed Hungary from a neglected and oppressed province of the Habsburgs into a modern constitutional and independent state. The armed attack on it by the Habsburg Army led to a War of Independence, and it was followed with keen interest by millions in Europe and America. Following a series of spectacular victories in the spring the Hungarian Parliament elected Kossuth Governor-President on April 14, 1849. The U.S. sent an envoy, Mr. Dudley Mann, with the intention of recognizing Hungary's independence. That was forestalled by the Russian intervention—for the first, but not for the last time! President Zachary Taylor was an enthusiastic supporter of the cause of Hungary—his reports and instructions to the Senate at the end of 1849 testify that.

The bloody reprisals following the surrender of the Hungarian Army in August 1849 even increased the sympathy worldwide—this is another painful parallel with 1956.

There were a number of prominent members of the U.S. Congress who took a very strong interest in Hungary in those days, most notably Senator Cass of Michigan (who in early 1850 moved to break diplomatic relations with Austria), and Senator Webster of Massachusetts. There was even a move in the House of Representatives to censure the President and the Secretary of State for failing to recognize the independence of Hungary in due time.

The death of President Taylor was a blow to the Hungarians as well. His successor, President Fillmore was more reserved, but his Secretary of State became Webster, an admirer of Kossuth. In Spring 1851 Senator Foot of Mississippi moved to send a warship for Kossuth to bring him over to the States from his exile in Turkey. The Senate concurred, and the frigate Mississippi was dispatched.

Kossuth arrived in New York on December 4, 1851. He was welcomed by huge crowds, both there and subsequently in Philadelphia and Baltimore. The exiled Head of State came to the United States with far higher aims than raising money for the continuation of the Hungarian War of Independence. While he fully understood why the Founding Fathers of the Republic warned against entangling alliances, he hoped to bring about a fundamental change in U.S. foreign policy: to convince the country that the time came for taking an active role in international affairs, commensurate with its strength, and to make Americans realize the interdependence of Europe and the U.S., that the Atlantic was no longer a barrier but rather a link, that freedom and democracy in Europe was also a vital interest for the American Republic, and, finally, that the two English-speaking countries must be allied so that they could jointly prevent tyrannical, authoritarian countries like Russia from suppressing the striving of subject nations for freedom.

The effort to bring about a fundamental change in U.S. foreign policy, to abandon neutrality and isolationism was bound to fail in 1852—but wasn't Kossuth's only a premature but sound idea? Sixty-six years later, in 1917, the U.S. acted along such lines, and ninety years later the Atlantic Charter came to embody the principles first advocated by the Hungarian leader.

While Kossuth's first speeches in New York were received most warmly by crowded audiences, they cooled the enthusiasm of quite a few in Congress. On Dec. 2, 1851 the President expressed his wish that Congress should decide on how to receive the Hungarian statesman. A heated debate started on the following day. Foote's move for an official reception was opposed by Southern Democrats and by radical free-soilers, who saw a contradiction between welcoming a foreign freedom-fighter while denying freedom to slaves. Conservatives denounced Kossuth as a revolutionary. The debate ran for eight days! Charles Sumner of Massachusetts called Kossuth "a living Washington," while Senator Seward of New York gave a moving testimony of his significance, as follows: "Mr. President, in the course of human events, we see the nations of Europe struggling to throw off the despotic systems of government, and attempting to establish a government based upon the principles of republicanism or of constitutional monarchy. Whenever such efforts are made, it invariably happens that the existing despotisms of Europe endeavor to suppress the high and holy endeavor, and to subdue the people by whom it is made. The consequence is that despotism has one common cause; and it results that the cause of civil and constitutional liberty has, in all countries, become one common cause—the common cause of mankind against despotism. Now, whatever nation leads the way at any time—at any crisis—in this contest for civil liberty, it becomes, as we perceive, the representative of all the nations of the earth. We once occupied that noble and interesting position, and we engaged the sympathies of civilized men throughout the world. No one can deny that now, or recently, Hungary took that position. We had a messenger on the spot ready to acknowledge her independence; and this our own proceeding show that we, in common with the friends of civil liberty elsewhere, hailed Hungary as such a representative of the nations of the earth."

Senator Cass said that while denouncing Russia's intervention was morally imperative, it did not mean that the U.S. would send a fleet to European waters. Stephen Douglas called attention to the fact that Kossuth challenged European absolutism, the antipode of the basic principles the U.S. had been built upon and that he was a representative of world freedom. (Today we might use the expression "a world whole and free.") Finally on Dec. 12 the Senate adopted Seward's motion with Shield's (Ill.) modification: Kossuth was to be received exactly like Lafayette had been. There was 36 vote for that and 6—from the South—against. The House of Representatives concurred on Dec. 15: 181 for and 16 against, with Rep. Smith from Alabama saying that if Kossuth continued to agitate against friendly Austria he should be arrested! All that shows that while the country came under the spell of the Hungarian leader, Congress overwhelmingly concurring, sectional interests and ideological concerns acted as a brake even in what was hardly more than a symbolic gesture.

Kossuth's train arrived in Washington on Dec. 30. He was received by Senators Shield and Seward. Secretary Webster immediately visited him in his hotel, followed by the mayor and a large number of politicians and various associations, delegations. The House was still debating about the details of his reception. On the next day, Dec. 31, Kossuth called upon President Fillmore. In a masterly speech he presented the case of Hungary, calling for help. The President expected only a courtesy call, so in his answer he told that he personally sympathized with Hungarian independence, but the policy of the Union would not abandon the traditions. This should not have been a surprise, but nevertheless it was a cold shower for Kossuth.

On Jan. 7 Cass, Shields and Seward presented him to the Senate, and on the same day the House appointed three members to show him to the House. Kossuth's answer to the welcoming words of the Speaker was brief but telling. "It is a remarkable fact in the history of mankind, that while, through all the past, honors were bestowed upon glory, and glory was attached only to success, the legislative authorities of this great republic bestow the highest honors upon a persecuted exile, not conspicuous by glory, not favored by success, but engaged in a just cause.

There is a triumph of republican principles in this fact. Sir, in my own and my country's name, I thank the House of Representatives of the United States for the honor of this cordial welcome."

On that evening a banquet was given by both Houses in Kossuth's honor, with 250 attending, including Webster and two other members of the cabinet. Kossuth gave a noncontroversial speech: "Happy is your great country, Sir, for being so warmly attached to that great principle of self-government. Upon this foundation your fathers raised a home for freedom more glorious than the world has ever seen. Happy is your great country, Sir, that it was selected by the blessing of the Lord to prove the glorious practicability of a federative union of many sovereign states, all preserving their state-rights and their self-government, and yet united in one. Every star beaming with its own lustre, but altogether one constellation on mankind's canopy."

Despite a few dissenting voices Kossuth's reception in Congress was exceptional in both form and substance. Since the political aims of the Hungarian leader could not be met by the legislature, he took his message to the country, embarking on a tour that took him as far as St. Louis in the West, New Orleans in the South and Boston in the North. There were moving outpourings of sympathy, and occasionally even the idea of intervention was endorsed. Much of the financial contributions were, however, spent by the local hosts on lavish hospitality—to the grief of Governor Kossuth.

In an epilogue added to the reprinted version of a volume of Kossuth's speeches published in 1852 Professor Béla Várdy reminds us: "Millions of Americans came under his spell . . . dozens of books, hundreds of pamphlets, and thousands of articles and essays, as well as nearly two hundred poems were written to him or about him." The names of Emerson, Longfellow, Horace Greeley, James Russel Lowell, Harriet Beecher Stowe stand out among those authors. But undoubtedly the greatest person who was inspired by the exiled Hungarian leader was Abraham Lincoln. On January 9, 1852, Lincoln said in the legislature of Illinois: "We recognize in Governor Kossuth of Hungary the most worthy and distinguished representative of the cause of civil and religious liberty on the continent of Europe."

Perhaps the most memorable speech of Kossuth was delivered in Columbus, Ohio, to the legislature on February 7: "Almost every century has had one predominant idea which imparted a common direction to the activity of nations. This predominant idea is the spirit of the age, invisible yet omnipresent, impregnable, all-pervading, scorned, abused, opposed yet omnipotent. The spirit of our age is Democracy. All for the people and all by the people. Nothing about the people without the people. That is democracy, and that is the ruling tendency of the spirit of our age." It is quite probable that these words were remembered by Lincoln, as the Gettysburg Address echoes Kossuth's definition of democracy.

The influence of Kossuth in the U.S. did not come to an end with his departure in July 1852. His contemporaries, the crowds and also the politicians remembered him for a long time. Many children were named after him. Generations of Americans grew up associating Hungary with Kossuth and liberty. Both Theodore and Franklin Delano Roosevelt showed a remarkable knowledge of and sympathy to Hungary, most probably going back to 1848 and Kossuth's memory.

In the late 19th and early 20th century hundreds of thousands of poor Hungarians arrived in the U.S. in search of employment and a better life. Most of them stayed here. For these downtrodden immigrant "Hunkies" Kossuth represented a hero, known and respected by their new country, no wonder that they named streets and buildings after him and erected statues to him, in Cleveland, New York, Pittsburgh and elsewhere. In World War II, the warship "U.S.S. Kossuth" was built on the donations of Hungarian-Americans.

The Hungarian Revolution of 1956 showed that Kossuth's spirit remained a force inspiring the people of Hungary. The symbol of the Revolution was the coat-of-arms used by Kossuth. The new fight of the Hungarians for freedom re-awakened sympathy throughout the U.S. Following its suppression, against by Russian arms, tens of Hungarian refugees were admitted and welcomed by America. Soon a stamp of Kossuth was issued in the "Champions of Liberty" series. Thirty-three years later the end of communism and Hungary's role in it was the realization of Kossuth's dreams of an independent and democratic country. Today Hungary is trying to live up to the high standards set by its great son.

In 1990, in the middle of another, now bloodless, Hungarian revolution, on the initiative of Congressman and Mrs. Annette Lantos, a bust was unveiled in the Capitol in a moving ceremony in the Rotunda. And now, 150 years after the visit of Governor-President Kossuth dozens of commemorations are held in the U.S. reminding the present generation of those stirring times. I am extremely grateful to the American people for having preserved the memory of our great leader and for giving me this unique opportunity to speak in this magnificent institution, recalling when Kossuth and Hungary filled the pages of the Congressional Record.

PAYING TRIBUTE TO THE VERY REV. PROTOPRESBYTER STEPHEN DUTKE ON THE 60TH ANNIVERSARY OF HIS ORDINATION

HON. MAURICE D. HINCHEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. HINCHEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute today to the Very Rev. Protopresbyter Stephen Dutke in celebration of his 60th anniversary of the Ordination to the Holy Priesthood. I am pleased to congratulate Father Dutke for his 60 years of distinguished service.

Father Dutke was born on January 3, 1917 in Nesquehoning, Pa, the son of Damian and Susan Dutke. He grew up in Elizabeth, NJ and graduated from Thomas Jefferson High School and Union Junior College in Cranford, NJ. He studied theology at the Diocesan Seminary of Christ the Saviour Seminary graduating in 1942. He married Mary Dzuback of Bayonne on May 3, 1942 and was ordained as an Orthodox priest by Bishop Orestes on May 10, 1942.

Father Dutke organized St. Mary's Church in Buffalo, NY serving as its first pastor. He also served as pastor to St. Michael's Church in Freeland, PA from November of 1947 to August of 1961, where he oversaw the construction of the new rectory, the decorating of the church and the construction of the parish recreation center in 1959. He was assigned to St. Michael's Church in Binghamton, NY in August of 1961, where he served as pastor until July of 1991 and continues to serve as pastor emeritus.

At St. Michael's, he spearheaded a $200,000 renovation project of the church for its 60th anniversary in 1964 as well as the creation of classrooms and a library for the Church School program at the recreation center. Throughout his pastorate, he distinguished himself by his selfless ministry to those who are ill and afflicted at home, local hospitals and nursing homes. He fostered 12 vocations to the Holy Priesthood including four men from Freeland and eight from Binghamton. For more than three decades, he served as director of the annual Diocesan Altar Boys Retreat, encouraging many boys to strengthen their faith and service to the church, both as laypeople and priests.

Father Dutke served as Director of the Diocesan Priests' Pension Plan, a member of the Diocesan Liturgical Music Commission, as a member of the Diocesan Consistory and Board of Trustees for more than 30 years. His All-Holiness Patriarch Dimitrious designated him as a Proto-Priest in 1966 and as a Protopresbyter of the Ecumenical Patriarchate in 1989. Since his retirement in 1991, he has continued to assist at St. Michael's, serving one of the Sunday Liturgies, managing the annual Pirohi Project and continuing his pastoral work through visiting the sick at hospitals and nursing homes.

Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to salute Father Dutke for his many years of distinguished service to our community. It is my pleasure to join Father Dutke's friends, family and congregation in extending my deepest appreciation for his outstanding service.

IN HONOR OF THE UNITY FELLOWSHIP CHURCH MOVEMENT OF NEW YORK

HON. EDOLPHUS TOWNS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in honor of a vital community organization that has affected real change in its short history.

On May 10, 1992, Reverend Zachary G. Jones held its first worship service in the Charles Angel room of the New York City Lesbian and Gay Community Center. On that historic Sunday afternoon, Reverend Jones ministered to approximately 15 people. The group heard what continues to be the core message of the church to this day, "God is Love and Love is for everyone" and "Let nothing or no one separate you from the Love of God". During that time many people with alternative lifestyles felt that they were turned away from their traditional houses of worship because of their orientation and the HIV/AIDS epidemic. Since that first service, now Bishop Zachary G. Jones has built a congregation of more than 600 members andover 200,000 people of faith from New York City and around the world have attended his services. In addition, today, Unity Fellowship Church Movement of New York has a permanent location at 230 Classon Avenue in Brooklyn. Clearly, this church has filled a void.

Unity Fellowship Church Movement of New York's mission states that it is a social justice ministry that teaches freedom on all levels of racial, sexual, religious and social-economic oppression. They carry out their mission through a variety of programs designed to meet the needs of the community and their parishioners, such as, their hunger program which has fed over 5,000 homeless individuals and families; their creation of the "Unity in Community Week" to publicly address homophobia, health education, racism, and violence based on sexual orientation; "Unity fellowship breaking ground" an organization dedicated to providing social services to support gay and lesbian youth in Brooklyn. This is the first organization of color in New York dedicated to the needs of the Lesbian and Gay community on a regular basis.

Mr. Speaker, Bishop Zachary G. Jones fulfills his mission every day as he reaches out to people outside of the regular church setting who share a commitment to God but have lacked the opportunity to practice their faith freely because of their sexual orientation. As such, I urge my colleagues to join me in honoring this unique and vital organization on its 10th Anniversary.

TRIBUTE TO CHRIS HAAS

HON. JOHN M. SPRATT, JR.

OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. SPRATT. Mr. Speaker, I want to call to the attention of the House the bravery of Chris Haas, a sixth grader who is captain of the Safety Patrol at North Hartsville Elementary School in Hartsville, South Carolina.

Last December, Chris saved a fellow student from serious injury. Because he was on the alert, he noticed a girl's book bag and shirt caught in a car's rear tire, and saw that she was being pulled under the car before the driver knew what was happening. Chris jumped in front of the moving car and stopped it. His bravery saved the young girl from serious harm.

Students like Chris Haas report for duty on Safety Patrol every school day at North Hartsville Elementary School. Dressed in orange safety hats and belts and silver badges, they can be found helping students get safely across the street, and in and out of cars.

I want to salute Chris Haas for his courage and recognize all the other members of the Safety Patrol for helping make North Hartsville Elementary School a safe place to learn.

PRESCRIPTION DRUG BENEFIT

HON. STEPHANIE TUBBS JONES

OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mrs. JONES of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I represent the great City of Cleveland Ohio, which is home to the Rock-n-Roll Hall of Fame and also music legends such as the singing group the O'Jays.

The O'Jays had legendary hits in the 1970s like "Climbing the Stairway to Heaven," "Back Stabbers," and "For the Love of Money".

Just like in the 1970s when these songs of conscience were the rallying cry for so many around the country, they still have relevance today when you consider how we in Congress have yet to pass a true and comprehensive prescription drug benefit for our greatest treasure—Senior Citizens.

I hope people remember the titles of these songs when trying to figure out why we in Congress have yet to pass what we promised you sometime ago—Medicare Prescription Drug Coverage.

Yes, my colleagues on the other side of the aisle have touted a new Medicare reform package that is suppose to address the ills of those Americans who are forced to decide between eating or taking their medicine—Senior Citizens.

I don't know a song title that would address this concern but I believe one of the three songs, I mentioned is appropriate and believe if you listen very closely to the tone my colleagues on the other side of the aisle are humming it just might be one of these songs—like "Back Stabbers" or "Climbing the Stairway to Heaven".

My personal favorite is "For the Love of Money" which was one of the O'Jays greatest hits. In one stanza in the song, the lead singer states, "For the love of money, a person would steal from his own mother."

This is what is happening in many cases because I know many of my colleagues are not listening to their conscience but rather House Leadership—Leadership which does not want to see a true comprehensive prescription drug benefit this Congress but would rather wait.

Waiting is an indication that many more people will continue to suffer because of inaction on our part.

I was raised to believe that a broken promise is equivalent to stealing.

But House leadership wants us to keep dancing. I pose the question to all—What are we dancing to?

It seems that my colleagues once again have dropped a quarter in their rhetorical jukebox that plays music that they want us to dance to.

But this time, I hope all of America listens closely to the beat and is not fooled by the words of the song or its rhetoric. Because if you listen closely you will hear:

LOWER THE COST OF PRESCRIPTION DRUGS NOW

Translation. Take credit for minimal discounts that are already available.

GUARANTEE ALL SENIOR CITIZENS PRESCRIPTION DRUG COVERAGE

Translation. Promise seniors an inadequate drug benefit offered by private insurance companies.

IMPROVE MEDICARE WITH MORE CHOICES AND MORE SAVINGS

Translation: Shift costs to seniors and limit choice of providers.

STRENGTHEN MEDICARE FOR THE FUTURE

Translation: Undermine Medicare by forcing seniors into private insurance and HMOs for drug coverage.

Stop the dancing! Stop the music!

OUR SERVICEWOMEN FIGHTING FOR FREEDOM DESERVE FREEDOM

HON. SAM FARR

OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. FARR of California. Mr. Speaker, earlier today, the House denied itself the opportunity to address a discriminatory practice affecting the women serving in our military. An amendment which would have required equal treatment of servicewomen overseas was prevented from coming to the floor. I consider this a great loss to all those who serve in our military and all Members of Congress who wished to express their conviction that our military can and must treat its members fairly.

The military currently requires or strongly encourages servicewomen to wear abayas and headscarves, complete coverings of their bodies, while off-base in Saudi Arabia. The military makes no such recommendations to servicemen to dramatically alter their appearance. The government of Saudi Arabia does not require non-Muslim women to wear abayas, and the U.S. State Department does not encourage its female embassy employees nor tourists to wear abayas.

I believe it is important to remember that the women who have served in our military have not always responded to a call. For many, they proudly volunteered long before a call was ever sounded.

During the American Revolution, wives followed their husbands into war, mothers followed their sons. They brought water and supplies, they tended the wounds of those who were injured, and they took up the rifles of those who had fallen.

In World War I, women were, for the first time, allowed to enlist. More than 30,000 did so, a third of them served overseas. Since then, women of all generations have served in wars and conflicts far from their homes and families.

Discrimination in the military is an insult to the memory of those women who died in service to their country and a grave injury to those who currently serve. These women, who have helped foster freedom in nations on whose soil their blood has been shed, are owed the certainty that the military does not see them for their gender but rather for their courage and commitment to the ideals embraced by all of its military personnel.

During the Gulf War, helicopter pilot Major Marie Rossi, now buried in Section 8 of Arlington National Cemetery, offered her thoughts on the work of women in the military, "It's our jobs, you know. There was nothing peculiar about us being women. We're just the people called upon to do it."

The more than 300,000 women currently serving in our military would tell you the same. The House of Representatives should have seized the opportunity to tell our military women that we agree: their contributions and sacrifices are deeply appreciated by their nation. The military must not treat them as second-class citizens.

IN HONOR OF VIVIAN BECKER

HON. EDOLPHUS TOWNS

OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in honor of Vivian Becker on the occasion of her retirement from the Pratt Area Community Council (PACC).

In 1989, Vivian Becker was appointed Executive Director of PACC—then a 25-year-old three-employee community organization dedicated to improving the community. Today, under Vivian's leadership PACC now stands out as a leading community-based organization with a revenue stream of $3 million a year as well as a full-time staff of more than thirty people and a host of community volunteers and interns. PACC has not just grown; it has flourished through Vivian's hard work, dedication, and fine leadership.

Vivian saw the tremendous potential in PACC and in the community and has done an outstanding job in using both to their mutual advantage. Through tenant and community organizing, Vivian and PACC have helped residents in the traditionally low- and moderate-income communities of Fort-Greene, Clinton Hill, and Bedford Stuyvesant to achieve self-sufficiency, develop a sense of community, and attain overall neighborhood revitalization. They have also overseen the development of more than 50 buildings, which created more than 500 units of affordable housing for families in need.

Moreover, under Vivian's leadership, PACC has addressed community issues by solving community problems. Vacant lots were turned into community gardens, blocks that were not organized, were organized and the problem of homelessness became a top priority. In addition, PACC has offered tenant and homeowner services as well as community economic development assistance.

Mr. Speaker, Vivian Becker has spent the past thirteen years turning a small community organization into a powerful force that has improved the quality of life for everyone within their catchment area. She is a hard-working dedicated leader who has left an extraordinary legacy in Brooklyn. As such, she is more than worthy of receiving this recognition and I urge my colleagues to join me in honoring this truly outstanding community builder.

TRIBUTE TO THOMAS CHESTNUT, SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION ARIZONA BUSINESS PERSON OF THE YEAR

HON. JIM KOLBE

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. KOLBE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor the achievements of Thomas Chestnut, a resident of Tucson, Arizona. Recently, Tom was named Small Business Person of the Year for the State of Arizona by the U.S. Small Business Administration.

Tom formed Chestnut Construction in 1990, starting with three employees. That year, the company had $886,000 in revenue. Today, Chestnut Construction is one of the largest and most respected general commercial contracting firms in southern Arizona, with 44 employees and more than $55 million in revenue.

Tom believes in commitment and loyalty to his staff, clients, subcontractors, and vendors. The majority of Tom's employees hired in the first few years of business are with the company today. His first contracted client is still one of Tom's most valuable customers.

As his company has profited, Tom has added more benefits for his employees. Today, Chestnut Construction provides its employees with healthcare, life and disability insurance, profit sharing, vacation, and bonuses that are uncommon in the construction industry or many other small businesses. Benefits even include the free use of a company-owned cabin.

Beyond treating its own employees very well, Chestnut Construction gets top marks for a hands-on approach in the performance of construction projects. Outsiders see that the company has a team attitude in their accomplishments.

Tom's philosophy is to work with the subcontractors and vendors, treat them well, pay them on time and build loyalty. It has resulted in a reputation of being fair and equitable in all aspects of his business. About 85 percent of Chestnut's work comes from repeat clients, and almost all advertising is word of mouth.

The concept of building a better community has double meaning for this construction company. Tom strongly urges employees to get involved in the community. Last year, donations to charitable organizations in cash, in-kind contributions and donated labor were above $60,000.

Since 1996, Chestnut Construction has won 10 awards in southern Arizona, including such categories as general contractor of the year, community service, and best place to work. Tom's philosophy has resulted in his being elected the founding chairman of the Arizona Builders' Alliance and the only general contractor ever honored with three Cornerstone Awards, which signify teamwork, quality of product, on-time delivery and dedication to the community.

I congratulate Thomas Chestnut on his Small Business Person of the Year award, and I applaud his hard work, his steadfast dedication to his profession and commitment to his community.

YUCCA MOUNTAIN REPOSITORY SITE APPROVAL ACT

SPEECH OF

HON. BETTY McCOLLUM

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 2002

Ms. McCOLLUM. Mr. Speaker, nuclear power has a role to play in our nation's energy policy. Our government must fulfill its obligation to store radioactive waste. The transportation and security concerns associated with Yucca Mountain can be overcome. However, by allowing this project to proceed, we do nothing to address the ongoing production of more nuclear waste.

I cannot support this resolution without a national policy to reduce additional nuclear waste. Forty years of nuclear power production in the United States has left a disturbing legacy—45,000 tons of radioactive waste stored in more than 70 communities. While this resolution recognizes the need for Yucca Mountain to store old waste, it does nothing to address the new waste currently being produced. With new waste being produced every day, Yucca Mountain will be full even before it opens. Today's debate should be about the future of nuclear energy and how we deal with its toxic debris.

Congress and the nuclear power industry must join together in an effort to reduce, recycle and minimize nuclear waste production. Unless our nation accepts the very real environmental and economic costs of nuclear energy, coal and oil, we will continue to perpetuate our addiction to unsustainable sources of energy. My constituents have expressed their frustration at our collective failure to take responsibility for our nation's nuclear energy policy. My vote is their voice on this issue. We must look comprehensively at our future energy policy and develop long-term, sustainable energy sources.

100TH ANNIVERSARY OF FORT WORDEN

HON. NORMAN D. DICKS

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Speaker, this weekend we are celebrating the Centennial of Fort Worden in Port Townsend, Washington, and I would like to take this opportunity to mark this occasion here in the House of Representatives. Fort Worden is a wonderful piece of our nation's history, first established on May 14, 1902 as part of a series of installations designed to provide protection along Puget Sound waters for the important naval Shipyard in Bremerton. It was named for Admiral John L. Worden, who was the commander of the battleship Monitor in the famous Civil War battle with the Confederate ship Merrimac. The Fort was later designated as the headquarters for the harbor defenses for Puget Sound, and it was fortified with heavy gun batteries and defensive structures. During World War II, the Fort served as home to the Army's 14th Coast Artillery Regiment and the Washington National Guard's 248th Regiment.

Fort Worden's military role diminished in the 1940's, and it was decommissioned as an active military post in 1953, though various limited Navy and Army functions continued for some years after. It later served as home to a Treatment Center for juvenile delinquents, operated by the State of Washington, before it was finally acquired by the State and turned into a State Park in 1973. The old Fort buildings have been transformed into a Conference Center, and the site offers ample opportunity for recreation and camping. Having been listed on the National Register of Historic Places, it now serves as one of the most picturesque and stately locations in the State of Washington. In fact, I am sure many of my colleagues can recall the views of the Fort's classic old white buildings in the feature movie "An Officer and a Gentleman," as Fort Worden served as the film's backdrop in 1981.

Today, Fort Worden remains a gathering place for people from across the Pacific Northwest to come for educational, cultural and arts programs, as well as recreational activities. It is a link to our past; a reminder of the state's very early role in the defense of our nation. I am proud that Fort Worden will be a partner with the Library of Congress on the Veterans History Project, honoring America's war veterans. And I am proud that so much of the military history of the Fort has been preserved, including the Commanding Officers Quarters Museum and the Pacific Coast Artillery Museum.

On the 100th Birthday of Fort Worden, I believe it is appropriate,

Mr. Speaker, to recognize the historical significance of this facility and its ongoing role in the Pacific Northwest.

EXPRESSING THE SENSE OF THE CONGRESS REGARDING THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT

HON. RON PAUL

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. PAUL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce a bill Expressing the Sense of the Congress regarding the International Criminal Court.

On Monday, May 6, President George W. Bush directed his representative to inform United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan that the United States "does not intend to become a party to the treaty [the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC)]." President Bush is to be highly commended for renouncing the U.S. signature on the ICC treaty, a bold first step toward protecting American servicemembers and citizens from the possibility of unwarranted and politically-motivated persecutions.

By taking this action, President Bush has put the international community on notice that the United States will defend its sovereignty and citizens from this global court. The Bush Administration correctly pointed out that the ICC has unchecked power that contradicts our Constitution and its system of checks and balances; that the Court is "open for exploitation and politically-motivated prosecutions;" and that "the ICC asserts jurisdiction over citizens of states that have not ratified the treaty"—which seriously threatens American sovereignty.

I applaud President Bush in making it perfectly clear that the United States wants no part of the ICC. He faced enormous pressure from the international community to do otherwise, yet he did the right thing.

But this is only a first step. As Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld stated this week, upon our renunciation of the ICC: "Unfortunately, the ICC will not respect the U.S. decision to stay out of the treaty. To the contrary, the ICC provisions claim the authority to detain and try American citizens—U.S. soldiers, sailors, airmen and Marines, as well as current and future officials—even though the United States has not given its consent to be bound by the treaty." Secretary Rumsfeld added, "When the ICC treaty enters into force this summer, U.S. citizens will be exposed to the risk of prosecution by a court that is unaccountable to the American people, and that has no obligation to respect the Constitutional rights of our citizens."

Undersecretary of State Marc Grossman, explaining the president's decision to withdraw from the ICC, made the following critical point: "Notwithstanding our disagreements with the Rome Treaty, the United States respects the decision of those nations who have chosen to join the ICC, but they in turn must respect our decision not to join the ICC or place our citizens under the jurisdiction of the court." There is no indication that Undersecretary Grossman's message has been received.

Therefore, this legislation makes it clear that Congress should take all steps necessary to grant appropriate authority to the president to defend the American people—servicemember and citizen alike—from the threat of arrest, prosecution and conviction by the International Criminal Court.

I am introducing this legislation to also to commend President Bush for his courageous move, to assure the president that this body supports his action to protect the Constitution and American sovereignty. We have all taken an oath to protect and defend the Constitution, and we should stand with the president.

I rise, finally, to encourage the president to remain steadfast in his intention of protecting American servicemembers and citizens from the unchecked power of the International Criminal Court. This is only the beginning, however, there is much more to be done.

CONGRATULATING THE MEN AND WOMEN OF VALLEY BRONZE AND STEWART SPRINGS, LTD.

HON. GREG WALDEN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. WALDEN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to offer my congratulations to the men and women of Valley Bronze and Stewart Springs, Ltd. for their success in receiving the contract to adorn the World War II monument on the National Mall in Washington, D.C. Valley Bronze is a foundry located in Joseph, Oregon in Wallowa County in my congressional district, a pristine sliver of the United States whose citizens live and breathe the heritage of the American West.

The successful bid award to participate in the construction of the World War II memorial was the product of a creative collaboration between David and Christine Jackman, the owners of Valley Bronze, and Janelle Stewart, the owner of Stewart Springs, Ltd., a drafting company also located in Joseph.

When it is complete, the "Freedom Wall" of the World War II memorial will feature 4,123 gold-plated stars cast by Valley Bronze, each of which will represent 100 American lives lost in the service of our nation during that terrible conflict. Fifty-six pillars will surround the memorial to represent every American state and territory, each of which will be decorated with bronze wreaths made in Joseph. Anchoring the flagpoles at the ceremonial entrance to the monument will be pedestals made by Valley Bronze, and monumental bas relief medallions representing the "victory medallions" given to World War II veterans will be embedded in the floor of the archways at each end of the memorial. Finally, four water fountains and 900 feet of decorative drainage grate will encircle the monument. I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that each of the decorations that will adorn the memorial will be cast with the care and precision to befit a monument in honor of America's patriot dead.

Mr. Speaker, awarding this bid to Valley Bronze is a reflection of the beauty of their work and the quality of their craftsmanship. It is fitting that the materials to build this monument to our nation's heroes will be brought together from across the American continent, just as America's sons and daughters came from cities and towns across this great land to answer their nation's call.

The national monument to the veterans of World War II will stand for generations as an enduring testament to the heroism and sacrifice of the men and women who have rightly been called the Greatest Generation. Visitors from across the United States and indeed the rest of the world will journey to our nation's capital to see this monument and pay their own private tribute to the legions of American soldiers, sailors, airmen and Marines who fought and died to prevent the spread of tyranny. They will do so enjoying the freedom won in part by the exertions of Oregonians, just as the beauty they admire was crafted by Oregonians' hands.

Mr. Speaker, I commend Valley Bronze and Stewart Springs, Ltd. for their outstanding success. The first-rate quality of their work was chosen as the finest in the land, and I am proud to represent them and their patriotic community in the House of Representatives.

RECOGNIZING DR. GEORGE KIDD, JR. FOR HIS CONTRIBUTIONS TO TIFFIN UNIVERSITY

HON. PAUL E. GILLMOR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. GILLMOR. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I rise today to pay tribute to Dr. George Kidd, Jr., upon his retirement as President of Tiffin University. Dr. Kidd has distinguished himself as one of the nation's outstanding educators, university administrators, and visionaries of higher education.

When Dr. Kidd became Tiffin University's President in April, 1981, the college's enrollment of 375 students occupied three academic buildings. The academic focus was its two-year associate degree program. The school's operating budget had produced seven consecutive annual deficits.

Dr. Kidd's legacy at Tiffin University is a transformed institution of higher knowledge, an innovative curriculum, a distinguished faculty, vibrant campus and a balanced operating budget.

Student enrollment now exceeds 1,600 with a primary focus shifted to the four-year bachelors degree programs. The university facilities now include eleven buildings, including three dormitories, a dining commons, a student center, gymnasium and 38 acres of athletic playing fields.

Dr. Kidd's tireless efforts on behalf of Tiffin University are matched only by his many selfless contributions to the Tiffin community. He has generously given of his time to local community service organizations, including Seneca County United Way, the Chamber of Commerce, Mercy Hospital, and many others.

Mr. Speaker, Dr. George Kidd's contributions to our country are as numerous as the many bright futures he has touched as an educator and a mentor. I ask my colleagues to join me in wishing him and his loving and equally talented wife, Dianne, good health and our very best wishes.

HORMONE DISRUPTION RESEARCH ACT OF 2002

HON. LOUISE McINTOSH SLAUGHTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Ms. SLAUGHTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to announce the introduction of the Hormone Disruption Research Act of 2002.

Arctic polar bears show high concentrations of certain synthetic compounds in their tissues. Whales in the world's oceans carry PCBs and other contaminants at concentrations which cause developmental defects in humans.

U.S. streams and groundwater show widespread contamination with chemicals, dioxins, and antibiotics. Alligators in Florida's lakes suffer from reproductive problems that appear to be associated with chronic chemical contamination. New studies have made a persuasive case that contaminants were in part or wholly responsible for the loss of the lake trout and herring in the Great Lakes many decades ago.

Rates of infertility, the incidence of testicular cancer in young men, Parkinson's disease, endometriosis, childhood diabetes, and asthma have risen dramatically since 1970.

What does this all mean? Are there connections between rising levels of chemicals in the environment and increasing rates of certain disorders in humans?

In many cases, we simply don't know. We do not have the scientific information that would allow us to draw solid conclusions. But a growing body of research suggests that there is indeed a connection between certain chemicals and human health.

In recent decades, scientists have begun to recognize and define the hazard posed by some chemicals to the human hormone (or endocrine) system. By definition, hormone disrupting chemicals interfere with the normal activity of hormones within the body. Some chemicals mimic natural hormones and send false messages. Other synthetic compounds block hormonal signals and prevent the proper action from taking place. Still others cause disruption by preventing the synthesis of the body's own hormones, or by accelerating their breakdown and excretion. Whatever the mechanism, the bottom line is the same: Any chemical that interferes directly or indirectly with hormones can scramble vital messages, derail development, and undermine health.

We are only now learning that the effects of hormone disruptors may affect more than one generation. Though adults may not show symptoms of exposure themselves, they may pass the "Imprint," or hormonal effects of exposure, on to their children. In those cases, it is the children whose development suffers. Since 1970, childhood cancers, learning disabilities, hyperactivity, autism, juvenile diabetes, early puberty, early testicular cancer, and infertility have increased significantly both in the United States and around the world. There is growing evidence to suggest that hormone disruptors play an important role in all of these disorders.

Today I am proud to introduce the Hormone Disruption Research Act of 2002. This legislation directs the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences (NIEHS) to conduct a major research program on hormone disruption. In addition, it requires NIEHS to report to the public every two years on the extent to which hormone disruption by chemicals poses a threat to human health and the environment. The bill authorizes $100 million per year for five years for this critically important program.

To date, federal research on hormone disruption has been scattershot and underfunded, even as evidence about hormone disruption has grown. The research program authorized through the legislation will enable NIEHS to gather solid data about the dangers posed by some chemicals and the mechanisms through which they act. With this information in hand, we can make sensible, informed decisions and policies about our own and our children's health and well-being.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting the Hormone Disruption Research Act. We owe it to future generations to pursue this scientific research, which has implications for every one of us.

NATIONAL SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

HON. DARRELL E. ISSA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. ISSA. Mr. Speaker, as part of National Small Business week, I rise today to recognize all the men and women who work in or for a small business in America. Small business is the heart of our economy and culture. It is where the American Dream time and time again is realized.

Prior to my election I was a small business owner. I started like millions of entrepreneurs with a vision and lifesavings. My wife Cathy and I started with $7,000 and founded Directed Electronics and within 10 years built a company that is an industry leader in automobile security products. I understand the workings of small business and want to take this time not only to commemorate, but to remind everyone the important role that small business plays in our economy.

Small Business is not only the backbone of our economy, but has also changed our culture. More small businesses are owned by women and minorities. There are now 9.1 million firms owned by women: these firms employ 27.5 million Americans. Minority-owned firms are the fastest growing segment from less than 7 percent of all U.S. firms in 1982 to 15.1 percent in 1997. Women and minorities are changing the face of business by helping break old sentiments of prejudices.

I appeal to my fellow colleagues to work to help small business to continue to flourish so that all Americans are able to realize their dream. Right now, small businesses represent 99.7 percent of all employers and employ 52 percent of the private workforce. This is a large block of the American people.

The President, in March, announced his small business agenda which included tax incentives for small businesses, making affordable health care available to more employees, and making the federal contract process more accessible to small businesses.

Small business is America. It is the future of our economy and culture. Let's not strangle it with regulation, but continue to help hardworking American workers and entrepreneurs by supporting the President's plan to help small businesses.

IN MEMORY OF COLONEL FRANCIS S. GABRESKI, WORLD WAR II ACE

HON. JOHN P. MURTHA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to remember to my Colleagues and to this great Country a most extraordinary Veteran who passed away this year.

Col Francis S. Gabreski, 83, America's air ace in Europe in WWII and an ace in the Korean War died January 31, 2002 of a heart attack.

One of five children, Gabreski was born in Oil City PA on January 28 1919. His parents were Polish immigrants. He would fly 266 combat missions in two wars destroying 37.5 enemy aircraft in World War II and 6.5 in Korea.

Flying single engine P–47 Thunderbolt fighters, Mr. Gabreski downed 28 Messerchmitts and FockeWulfs over France and Germany between August 24, 1943 and July 5, 1944, and destroyed three more German aircraft on the ground. He was captured in late July 1944 after crash-landing near Koblenz, Germany on what was to have been his last mission, and spent ten months as a prisoner of war. He became an ace (a pilot shooting down at least five enemy planes) in the Korean War as well, flying an F–86 Sabre jet. He shot down six Soviet-built MIG-15 fighters and shared credit for the downing of another.

His flying days began after he graduated from basic training in March, 1941 as a second lieutenant, and joined a fighter unit at Wheeler Field in Hawaii. On the morning of December 7, 1941, he was shaving when the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor. He scrambled to a P–36 fighter but by then the Japanese aircraft were nowhere in sight.

Because he spoke Polish and "I felt strongly about what the Nazis had done to Poland," he asked to be assigned to a Polish fighter unit attached to the Royal Air Force. He flew some two dozen missions over Europe with Polish pilots early in 1943 before joining the United States 56th Fighter Group in Britain.

After the war and a hero's welcome home, Gabreski worked for Grumman Aerospace and was head of the Long Island Rail Road, the nation's busiest commuter line.

Gabreski once said, "A pilot can contribute physical acumen, good eyesight and alertness. You have to be calm, cool and collected. Freeze, and you frighten yourself. But beyond that you need some luck to survive."

Gabreski lived in Dix Hills, NY. He is survived by three sons, six daughters, two sisters, eighteen grandchildren and four great grandchildren.

Among Gabreski's decorations were: The Distinguished Service Cross, Silver Star with Oak Leaf Cluster, Distinguished Flying Cross with nine Oak Leaf Clusters, Air Medal with four Clusters, the Bronze Star, The French Legion D'Honneur and Croix de Guerre with Palm, Polish Cross of Valor, the British Distinguished Flying Cross and the Belgian Croix de Guerre.

IMPROVE CHILD SURVIVAL AND MATERNAL HEALTH

HON. LOUISE McINTOSH SLAUGHTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Ms. SLAUGHTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce a resolution along with my colleague, Representative CONNIE MORELLA, voicing this body's commitment to improving the health of mothers and children around the world. This resolution illustrates that an increased commitment to improving the health of the world's mothers and children will have a long-term impact on the political, economic, and social progress of developing countries. The stability of our own nation depends significantly on the economic and political situation of developing nations. Their economic and political progression cannot be realized unless the health of their people is improved. The global community acknowledges this need.

On May 8–10, representatives from over 179 countries met at the United Nations Special Session on Children. During this meeting, they reviewed the progress made since the 1990 World Summit for Children and renewed their pledge to improve the lives of the world's children over the next decade.

Our Administration also acknowledges that investing in better health increases a country's ability to prosper. President Bush made a wise decision when he proposed increased funding for global HIV/AIDS programs at USAID. But it is disconcerting that his budget also recommends a $25 million decrease in support for maternal and child health programs. Difficult choices must be made, understandably, but funds should not be shifted from one essential health program to another.

At this precarious time in our world, we cannot lose sight of the health of women, the primary caregivers who instill values and provide hope for their children, the future of every society. Every year, over 500,000 women die during pregnancy and childbirth. The vast majority of these lives could be saved by low-tech, low-cost interventions. The health of a child and her mother are closely intertwined, and good maternal health is essential for the survival of both mother and child. In developing countries, a mother's death in childbirth due to malnutrition, or inadequate prenatal and delivery care, means almost certain death for her newborn child.

We must also invest substantially more in programs that improve the health of young children. Every year, nearly 11 million die needlessly before their fifth birthday—almost all from diseases easily prevented or readily treated. For example, pennies worth of antibiotics could save three million children who will die this year of pneumonia.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution calls for increased funding for basic child survival and maternal health programs of at least $500 million dollars. This figure is just a small investment when the dividends would be political stability, international security, and a renewed hope for the future of mothers and children around the world. Representative MORELLA and I urge our colleagues to join us in supporting this important resolution.

CELEBRATING THE WORK OF RABBI MORDECAI WAXMAN

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is an honor for me to call to the attention of the House of Representatives the work of Rabbi Mordecai Waxman, one of America's great citizens, who is retiring from his position as senior rabbi at Temple Israel in Great Neck, New York. On Sunday, May 19, Temple Israel will hold a dinner to celebrate and honor Rabbi Waxman for his 55 years of devoted service not just to the Jewish community on Long Island, but to the Jewish community throughout America and around the world.

Well-known throughout New York, Rabbi Waxman will be remembered in human history as one of the key figures in the effort to heal the painful breach between the Jewish people and the Roman Catholic Church. Working with two Popes, Rabbi Waxman played a key role in the Second Vatican Council's publication of the Nostra Aetate document, which transformed modem relations between Jews and Catholics.

Rabbi Waxman has not only been a leader between religions, but also a key figure in the U.S. Jewish community over several decades. Beginning with his ordination at the Jewish Theological Seminary in 1941, Rabbi Waxman has continuously sought opportunities for leadership, first, as the founding rabbi at Congregation Shaare Tikva in Chicago, Illinois and then, only a year later, serving as a U.S. Army chaplain from 1943 to 1946.

Following his service to our nation, Rabbi Waxman went on to lead Temple Israel, along the way becoming editor of the Journal Conservative Judaism, the president of the Rabbinical Assembly, the president of the World Council of Synagogues, the chairman of the International Jewish Committee for Interreligious Consultation, the chairman of the National Council of Synagogues and even the first rabbi to become a Knight Commander of the Order of Saint Gregory the Great due to his vital role in Jewish-Catholic rapprochement.

Mr. Speaker, America is not a great nation because a small corps of heroes do great deeds. America is a great nation because our charter of freedom has enabled thousands of ordinary men and women to do extraordinary things.

Rabbi Mordecai Waxman is just such an ordinary doer of extraordinary things. As a citizen, as a U.S. Army chaplain, as a leader of the Jewish community in America and internationally, and as a husband to the late Dr. Ruth Waxman, the father of Hillel, Jonathan and David Waxman, and the grandfather of five wonderful grandchildren, Ariya, Amir-Kia, Lailee, Jessye and Avir, Rabbi Waxman has represented what we all know is best about our nation and our society.

Mr. Speaker, I call upon the whole House to rise and join me in thanking Rabbi Mordecai Waxman for his contributions to our country and its citizens, and in wishing him a retirement of peace, contentment and good health.

ON PASSAGE OF THE CONFERENCE REPORT TO H.R. 2646, THE FARM SECURITY AND RURAL INVESTMENT ACT

HON. JUDY BIGGERT

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mrs. BIGGERT. Mr. Speaker, On May 2, 2002, the House approved the conference report to H.R. 2646, the Farm Security and Rural Investment Act, also known as the farm bill. I could not support this measure, for it represents a complete reversal of the 1996 Freedom to Farm Act, legislation that I have long supported.

The 1996 Freedom to Farm Act was a six-year attempt to wean farmers off government support, taking agriculture out of the hands of government control by eliminating subsidies and letting the market dictate prices and production levels. I acknowledge that the Freedom to Farm Act was not perfect, but instead of improving upon this approach and building on its early success, the conference report completely abandons the free market principles of Freedom to Farm and returns to government subsidies and hands-on government management of agriculture.

The Chicago Tribune ran an editorial on May 6, 2002, entitled "Congress at the trough," which reflects the sentiments many of us share with respect to the conference report to H.R. 2646. I bring the editorial to my colleagues' attention and ask that it be included in the record of debate on the conference report.

CONGRATULATING SBC

HON. CHARLES A. GONZALEZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, it is no secret that these are challenging times for our nation's economy. All of us are looking for solutions. And many of those solutions will come from America's small businesses, whose ability to grow and prosper is crucial for today's commerce.

Today, I would like to recognize a company, which does business in my district and many other congressional districts, for its role in helping small businesses—and, in particular, diverse businesses.

That company is SBC Communications, which earlier this month [May 7] received a Ron Brown Award for Corporate Leadership. This presidential award, named for the late Commerce Secretary, is presented to companies that have demonstrated a deep commitment to initiatives that empower employees and communities.

SBC was honored specifically for its excellence in promoting economic development through supplier diversity. Last year, the company spent 23.5 percent of its $12 billion procurement budget with businesses owned by women, minorities or disabled veterans. At the award ceremony, Commerce Secretary Don Evans praised SBC for its program and noted, correctly I think, that SBC "has set the standard for supplier diversity."

Beyond the immediate economic benefit for small and diverse companies, SBC's diversity program also ensures that these firms learn how to compete in a high-tech world. SBC doesn't just place orders with diverse companies—it actually recruits and trains them, offers special loan programs and makes available educational opportunities.

SBC wins from this commitment by broadening its supplier base and making sure that it is reaching out to all segments of society. Smaller, independent companies, especially those firms owned by women and minorities, win by gaining improved access to the world of big business. This is good for SBC, good for economic vitality and diversity, and good for America.

I congratulate SBC on this much-deserved award.

THE STOLEN ASSET RECOVERY ACT OF 2002

HON. MAXINE WATERS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to introduce The Stolen Asset Recovery Act of 2002. This bill would facilitate the identification of assets that have been stolen by dictators and other corrupt officials in developing countries and laundered in American financial institutions.

Many developing countries have been ruled by dictators and corrupt officials who have stolen millions of dollars from their people, laundering these stolen assets in banks and financial institutions in the developed world. Numerous dictators, such as Sani Abacha of Nigeria, Ferdinand Marcos of the Philippines, Mobutu Sese Seko of Zaire, Jean-Claude "Baby Doc" Duvalier of Haiti, Slobodan Milosevic of Yugoslavia, Suharto of Indonesia and the Taliban of Afghanistan, have plundered their countries' resources and left their people deeply impoverished and oppressed. When these corrupt officials leave their countries, the new governments typically lack the resources to thoroughly investigate the theft and identify the laundered assets.

The Stolen Asset Recovery Act of 2002 would require the Secretary of the Treasury to submit annual reports to the Congress on the laundering of stolen assets in American financial institutions. The reports would include an explanation of U.S. Government efforts to identify stolen assets, mechanisms available to the U.S. Government to identify stolen assets and legislation that could be enacted to facilitate the return of stolen assets to the people of the countries from which the assets were stolen. The legislation would also require the Secretary of the Treasury to urge international financial institutions, including the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, to provide to the United States copies of all audits regarding the use of funds loaned to governments where corruption has been a serious problem.

The United States should support efforts to identify assets stolen by corrupt foreign officials and facilitate their return to the people who rightfully own them. I urge my colleagues to support The Stolen Asset Recovery Act of 2002.

EXPRESSING SUPPORT FOR THE STATE OF ISRAEL

HON. MICHAEL E. CAPUANO

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. CAPUANO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my strong support for the State of Israel. I am wholly committed to the security and safety of Israel, a key strategic friend and ally. Last week I voted present on H. Res. 392, the DeLay Resolution entitled "Expressing Solidarity With Israel In Its Fight Against Terrorism." In December 2001, I voted for a similar resolution, H. Con. Res 280, also entitled "Expressing Solidarity With Israel In Its Fight Against Terrorism."

I voted "present" last week because I believed that this resolution did not promote the safety or security of Israel. I hope to see Israel and Palestine coexist as democratic states, each within secure and internationally recognized boundaries. I believe that the United States has an important role to play in promoting peace in the region. The language of this resolution was highly inflammatory, and I could not in conscience support a measure that might compromise our ability to seek peace.

Terrible carnage has claimed too many innocent lives, both Israeli and Palestinian. I voted as I did because I believe the United States can help end that carnage.

RECOGNIZING MAY 10TH ANNUAL PEACE OFFICER DAY IN COOK COUNTY, ILLINOIS

HON. LUIS V. GUTIERREZ

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. GUTIERREZ. Mr. Speaker, I wish to remind my colleagues of the countless sacrifices made by many police officers who serve us every day. In particular, we owe a special debt of gratitude to the many courageous men and women who have given their lives while protecting and defending others. In Congress, we enjoy the protection provided by members of the Capitol Police force, just as in our states, cities and localities we are privileged to be protected by some of the finest and bravest men and women. Unfortunately, far too many of their colleagues have lost their lives in the line of duty.

In the city of Chicago, these brave men and women will be remembered tomorrow, May 10, 2002 as part of the Cook County Peace Officer Day of Remembrance and Recognition. Last year, the Cook County Board of Commissioners passed a resolution establishing May 10th of every year, beginning this year, as this special day of remembrance. Tomorrow, the Cook County Peace Office Memorial Foundation will hold a special public ceremony to honor all current police officers for the difficult work that they do every day.

Mr. Speaker, I applaud the Cook County Peace Officer Memorial Foundation and their Co-Chairmen Jason H. Watson, Edward Sajdak, Nathan Camer, Daryl Bernard for organizing this special event. I also join them in saluting the officers who have made the ultimate sacrifice while making America's communities safe and secure for all of us.

NATIONAL CORRECTIONAL OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES WEEK

HON. TIM HOLDEN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. HOLDEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to all correctional officers and to honor the Week of May 5th as National Correctional Officers and Employees Week. Correctional officers play an imperative role in my Congressional District and throughout the country.

FBI Schuylkill, SCI Frackville, and SCI Mahanoy, as well as three county prisons, are six of the most critical employers in my district. The men and women who work at these facilities have the awesome responsibility of protecting my constituents and the public from inmates.

Correctional employees also have the important job of overseeing the rehabilitation of prisoners. They lead prisoners back into the community, supervising the construction of such things like recreation areas and baseball fields for children.

As the former sheriff of Schuylkill County, I worked hand-in-hand with the men and women who worked at the correctional facilities. No group of people understands the rigors and challenges of law enforcement greater than those who work in correctional facilities.

I would also like to pay tribute to the New York Corrections Department. On September 11, these men and women rushed to the scene of the World Trade Center tragedy to help evacuate the victims, once again proving the vital role correctional officers play in their communities.

Every day correctional officers go to work they face more danger than some of us face in our whole lives. It is a great honor to recognize these men and women and to recognize the Week of May 5th as National Correctional Officers and Employees Week.

HONORING THE 150TH CELEBRATION OF THE SISTERS OF MERCY IN CONNECTICUT

HON. JOHN B. LARSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. LARSON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor the 150th Celebration of the Sisters of Mercy mission in the state of Connecticut. Since their founding in Hartford in 1852, the Sisters have established many important organizations, including St. Mary Home for the Aged, 1880; the Ministry for the Deaf-American School for the Deaf, 1896; Academy of Our Lady of Mercy, 1905; Saint Joseph College, 1932; Mercy High School, 1963; Our Lady of Mercy School, 1964; Foreign Mission in Guatemala, 1981; Mercy Center at Madison, 1973; Mercy Housing & Shelter, 1983; Trust House Collaborative Learning Center, 1996; and the Collaborative Center for Justice, 1999.

The Sisters have turned their original stated purpose of the care of orphans and other works of Mercy into selfless acts that have improved the lives of millions of individuals.

Their work in education alone has influenced countless numbers of students who have in turn contributed to the development of both the Church community and the Connecticut community as a whole. The Sisters of Mercy have consciously identified the most pressing needs of the community and effectively used their resources to address those needs. Whether it be helping the economically poor, sick, elderly, imprisoned or ignorant, showing a special concern for women and children, or carrying out foreign missionary work, the actions of the Sisters can be described as nothing less than altruistic. They have supplemented time-honored strategies with conventional methods to address human needs in health care and pastoral and social services. The Sisters have generously provided for the spiritual welfare of thousands.

In July 1991, 7,000 Sisters of Mercy united as the Institute of the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas to become an international community. The Institute includes 25 regional communities with 5,500 members who serve in North, South and Central America, the Caribbean, Guam and the Philippines. The Sisters of Mercy of the Americas sponsor or cosponsor seven major national healthcare systems, 20 colleges and universities, 20 elementary and preschools, 39 secondary schools, and hundreds of affordable housing developments. They also serve in programs ranging from hospices for persons with HIV/AIDS, to adult literacy centers and resettlement programs for refugees.

It is the hope, on this Sesquicentennial Celebration, that their continued energy will allow them to focus on the state's residents and those beyond its borders who are in need for many years to come. I ask my colleagues to join me in commending the Sisters of Mercy for 150 years of service and commitment in the state of Connecticut. Personally, I would also like to thank Sister Patricia Rooney, RSM for her tireless work and effort, as well as my dear friend and former boss, Sister Marita Charles, RSM, who was principal of St. Mary's School in East Hartford, CT.

HONORING PENSACOLA JUNIOR COLLEGE AND THE SWITZER ARTS CENTER

HON. JEFF MILLER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. JEFF MILLER of Florida. Mr. Speaker, in 1947, Pensacola Junior College became the first public junior college to be established under Florida law. Subsequently, as the college grew, so did the recognition and support from the community. In 1965, the Pensacola Junior College (PJC) Foundation was incorporated as a non-profit corporation that could accept tax-deductible contributions from community supporters.

During the next three decades, the PJC Foundation helped the college expand its campus, through the addition of many new buildings, as well as additional campus locations. In December 1998, the PJC Foundation launched its first comprehensive fund drive. The goal was to raise $4.5 million. A lead gift of $1 million from the Switzer and Reilly families established the Anna Lamar Switzer Center for Visual Arts and got the campaign off to a successful start.

Born September 11, 1990, Anna Lamar Switzer, the namesake of the Switzer Center for Visual Arts, was an artist and published author who believed Pensacola should offer quality educational programs for those living in Northwest Florida.

Mr. Speaker, the United States Congress congratulates Pensacola Junior College and recognizes the generous contribution of the Switzer family. The arts center is a fitting memorial to Mrs. Switzer and an enduring opportunity for faculty, students, and the public to enjoy and learn form the visual arts as Mrs. Switzer did. The Switzer endowment has allowed PJC not only a renovated arts center, but a three-year faculty chair award, two-year student scholarship award, and the creation of the Distinguished Artist Lecture Series.

Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to honor the life of Anna Lamar Switzer, her love for education and her affection for her community of Pensacola.

STAND WITH ISRAEL

HON. STEPHEN F. LYNCH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, when I first visited Israel in 1998, I was introduced to the complexity and also the special beauty and historical importance that Israel represents. During my visit I met with various representatives of both the Israeli government and the Palestinian community. I remember that there existed at that time a cautious optimism and a hope that perhaps after generations of pain and suffering these groups were on the brink of peace. It is therefore with particular sadness that I have watched this holy land descend into the most extreme violence and bloodshed over the past 18 months. The traffic and horrifying carnage caused by suicide bombers, who are being used as a tool of terror against innocent children, is simply barbaric and upsets me greatly.

However, Mr. Speaker, we must not be moved to give in to these terrorists. I stand here today with many in this chamber to condemn these atrocities and express our support for the Israeli people.

On September 11th we learned how small the world has become. We can no longer ignore conflicts halfway around the world and pretend that they do not affect our own security.

Mr. Speaker, there is no future in a partnership with people encourage their own sons and daughters to die in acts of infamy and the random murder of innocent people. To compromise with a terrorist is to sponsor terrorism.

We must stand with Israel.

INTRODUCING THE ARSENIC TREATED LUMBER PROHIBITION AND DISPOSAL ACT

HON. JANICE D. SCHAKOWSKY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Ms. SCHAKOWSKY. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Arsenic Treated Lumber Prohibition and Disposal Act to protect children and families by phasing out the use of arsenic in pressure treated lumber and ensure that arsenic treated lumber is disposed of safely.

Most of the lumber sold for outdoor use in the U.S.—for school playgrounds and decks of private homes—is pressure-treated and injected with toxins to preserve the wood and prevent insect infestation. The most common wood preservative and pesticide used is chromated copper arsenate (CCA), which is 22 percent pure arsenic. A 12-foot section of pressure-treated lumber contains about an ounce of arsenic, enough to kill 250 people. An Environmental Working Group and Healthy Building Network study found that an area of arsenic-treated wood the size of a four-year-old's hand contains an average of 120 times the amount of arsenic allowed by the EPA in a 6-ounce glass of water. According to the report an estimated one out of every 500 children, who regularly play on playground equipment or decks made from pressure-treated wood can be expected to develop cancer later in life as a result of the exposure.

The Arsenic Treated Lumber Prohibition and Disposal Act will prohibit the use of CCA treated lumber once and for all. The Arsenic Treated Lumber Prohibition and Disposal Act, parallel legislation to Senator BILL NELSON's (S. 1963) bill, will phase-out the use of arsenic-treated lumber in residential settings: decks, playgrounds, walkways and fences within a year of enactment. It also requires the disposal of arsenic-treated lumber in lined landfills to prevent contamination of groundwater and requires the EPA to finish its risk assessment regarding arsenic-treated lumber. Finally, it provides monetary assistance to schools and local communities to remove arsenic-treated lumber from their playgrounds.

Arsenic can kill, and it causes cancer and other life threatening diseases. We can no longer ignore the dangers posed by exposing our children to this poison. The Arsenic Treated Lumber Prohibition and Disposal Act will protect the environment and health of American Families. I hope that all of my colleagues will join me in this effort to keep families safe.

IN RECOGNITION OF LIEUTENANT WILLIAM D. RISEN

HON. HILDA L. SOLIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Ms. SOLIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the contributions made by Lieutenant William D. Risen to the Monterey Park Police Department. After 30 years of dedicated service, Lieutenant Risen will retire on May 10, 2002.

A native of Monterey Park, Lieutenant Risen's commitment to his community characterizes his career. After receiving his Associate degree from East Los Angeles College, Lieutenant Risen served in the United States Army from 1970 to 1972. While in the Army, he earned several medals including the distinguished National Defense Service Medal and the Good Conduct Medal. After being honorably discharged, he returned to Monterey Park and joined the Monterey Park Police Department.

While at the police department, he was one of the police department's first K–9 officers. Lieutenant Risen and his trusted K–9 partner, Xello, worked side by side to arrest numerous felony suspects. Lieutenant Risen was part of the Investigations Bureau where his excellent investigator skills and strong work ethic earned him his appointment as Investigations Bureau Commander. As a Commander, he trained and mentored many of the police department's investigators.

Lieutenant Risen also supervised the Asian Gangs and Narcotics Task Force. It was in this capacity that his investigations and role during a narcotic shoot out, earned him the Distinguished Service Medal in 1998.

During the course of his career, he received numerous letters of appreciation and commendations for his work. Several of those letters recognized his compassion and aid to victims of violent crimes. Fellow law enforcement officers, friends and neighbors can all testify to his strength of character.

I commend Lieutenant Risen's commitment to public service. He will be missed by many, but we all wish him the best in his retirement and thank him for his many years of service.

HONORING GEORGE HERRING, ED.D., RETIRING AFTER 32 YEARS OF SERVICE TO THE PERALTA COMMUNITY COLLEGE DISTRICT

HON. BARBARA LEE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Ms. LEE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Dr. George Herring for his outstanding educational leadership and his many contributions to the Peralta Community College District.

Dr. Herring received his Bachelor of Science degree in Social Science from Jackson State University in Jackson, Mississippi and his Masters in Public Administration from University of California at Berkeley.

Dr. Herring came to the Peralta Community College District in 1970 as Director of the Ford Project, a program to assist under-represented students seeking to transfer to four year colleges, at Oakland's Merritt College. He went on to serve as Assistant Dean of Student Services at Merritt and was quickly promoted to Dean of Administration and Development.

While serving as Dean of Administration and Student Services at Merritt College, Dr. Herring concurrently acted as Dean of Student Services at Laney College, also located in Oakland, California and later went on to become the President of the College of Alameda in 1995, serving that institution for more than five years before accepting his position as Peralta's Senior Vice Chancellor.

While always busy with district and college affairs, Dr. Herring found the time to be active on numerous boards and commissions. He was President of the Northern California Research Group for three years, served three terms as the President of the Board of the YMCA of the East Bay, and is past President of the Western Regional Council on Black American Affairs.

Not only is Dr. Herring an active member of the community of higher education, he is also a current member of the California Community Colleges Commission on Athletics. Dr. Herring has won several National American Tennis Association championships and spends a great deal of his spare time teaching youth tennis and coaching little league baseball.

Mr. Speaker, as Dr. Herring leaves behind a long and rich history at the Peralta Community College District, I ask that Congress join me in expressing thanks to him for thirty-two years of exemplary service. I extend my best wishes to him as he begins his well-earned retirement and opens a new chapter of his life.

A WONDERFUL MAN

HON. STEPHEN HORN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. HORN. Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we honored a Celebration of the Life of Dr. James D. Ford, the Chaplain Emeritus of the House of Representatives.

When we traveled to meeting with the delegations of the European Parliament, we found that Jim was a very fine companion. Jim Ford was a great teacher. When we met diplomats and officers, Jim was able to lighten up some of us who were stressed from negotiations and differences among various factions.

Jim was a fine scholar of the Bible. When we were in Israel, Jim was well versed in three of the great religions which are in Jerusalem. Before Chaplain Ford came to the House, he had been for 18 years as the Chaplain of the United States Military Academy at West Point. As a result of his experiences at West Point, he knew about youth and how they grow to be leaders for our country. When a delegation of the House met with General Wesley Clark, the Supreme Commander of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization [NATO]. When the General met the Chaplain there was a warm hug. We saw a four star General, but, Dr. Ford remembered him as the very bright senior who was President of the Bible Society during Clark's senior year at West Point.

Dr. Ford was an effective counselor of members that work hard and often needed to be working with people under stress.

One of Jim's great adventures was when he and three volunteer cadets from West Point navigated a boat with sails, guided by the stars. The waves tossed the small boat in the North Atlantic Ocean. It was a great experience.

Jim was a people-person. When colleagues had medical operations at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center, Jim would come out to see us. He brought us cheer. His humor was delightful.

He will not be forgotten. Our condolences to Marcie, his wife, and Peter his eldest son, and the Ford family.

TRIBUTE TO ROBERT MORRISON AND DEREK MARTIN

HON. RICHARD A. GEPHARDT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, May 3, 2002 was a sad day for the City of St. Louis and for our entire community. On that day, St. Louis Firefighters Robert Morrison and Derek Martin were killed, fighting a fire in the performance of their duty.

Although neither thought of himself as a hero, Firefighters Morrison and Martin, both 38 years old, were heroes in the truest sense of the word. They risked their lives every day to protect the citizens of St. Louis, and considered that they were just doing their jobs. They didn't become firefighters for the money or to become famous. They joined the Fire Department out of a sense of duty to their community and a desire to help others. Their belief in duty and honor and self-sacrifice formed their lives, and was reflected in the way they conducted themselves on and off the job.

Mr. Speaker, the loss of these fine young men is a great tragedy. Their wives have lost their loving companionship; their children have lost the love, guidance and example of very special men. The entire St. Louis Community grieves with these families. Firefighters Robert Morrison and Derek Martin have left a legacy of decency and bravery that won't be soon forgotten, and we are grateful to have had them among us.

A TRIBUTE TO SMALL BUSINESS WEEK 2002

HON. SAM FARR

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 10, 2002

Mr. FARR of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the small business owners in my district and to celebrate Small Business Week 2002. Every morning, 25 million small businesses across the United States opened their stores and that number continues to grow. Small businesses account for 99.7 percent of all employers and it is time that we recognize them as the backbone of our economy.

In my home state of California, women and minorities make up the fastest growing group of new small business owners. Overall in the United States, the number of woman-owned businesses has almost doubled and minority-owned businesses have nearly quadrupled in the past decade. In order to ensure that this positive growth continues, we must work along side the Small Business Association and with the Small Business Development Centers and Women's Business Centers around the nation to increase accessibility to business counseling, startup packages, and loans.

Now more than ever, it is vital that we in Congress support the small business community so that in the wake of September 11th these businesses can continue to flourish. As Small Business Week 2002 comes to a close, let's remember to take time to acknowledge these Main Street businesses in our own towns and the important roles they play in maintaining a sound economy.

TRIBUTE TO DR. GEORGE RUPP

HON. JERROLD NADLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 10, 2002

Mr. NADLER. Mr. Speaker, today, I would like to recognize the distinguished service of one of the nation's foremost leaders in higher education, Dr. George Rupp, who is retiring after nine years as the President of Columbia University, my alma mater.

His stewardship of this world-renowned institution has been truly commendable, He has enhanced the University's already extraordinary level of achievement across all of its mission areas: in teaching; in research; and in service. Columbia is poised to celebrate its 250th anniversary in 2004 as a leading light in the renaissance of American higher education and as an exemplary model of the creation and spread of knowledge in the service of humanity.

Through the initiatives Dr. Rupp oversaw, Columbia has become one of the most sought after universities in the world, for scholars seeking to join its world class faculty, for recent graduates seeking to enter one of its many leading graduate and professional programs, and for high school students hoping to be amongst the one in seven applicants gaining admission to Columbia College. Some of this vitality can be seen in the physical environment of the University, which has benefitted from a revitalization effort widely praised for its sensitivity to the architectural history of Columbia's campuses and to the needs of their surrounding communities.

But in my opinion, Dr. Rupp's true achievement is less immediately visible. He has helped not just to assemble one of the most distinguished groups of scholars and researchers and one of the most gifted student bodies in the world; his has been one of the foremost voices reminding us that the strength of America's institutions of higher education stems from the connections they enable, between ideas and between ideas and applications. At Columbia, he has helped build the linkages that make the University a whole that is more than the sum of its parts.

A hallmark of Dr. Rupp's leadership has been the creation of innovative structures to meet the challenges posed by the increasingly multidisciplinary and interdependent nature of scientific research. In recent years, Columbia has drawn together scholars from different departments, schools and even outside institutions to develop new ways to organize the search for knowledge. These new centers include The Earth Institute, The Columbia Genome Center, The Center for Biomedical Engineering, The International Research Institute for Climate Prediction, and The Center for New Media Teaching and Learning. Such efforts will certainly further Columbia's already major role in a strong and successful partnership between the federal government and university-based research.

Under Dr. Rupp's tenure, Columbia's remarkable pool of talent and resources has been increasingly directed to the service of good citizenship. The University, the third largest employer in New York City, has been active in helping foster economic growth in its neighboring communities. For instance, Columbia helped develop the proposal for the Upper Manhattan Empowerment Zone (UMEZ), provided ongoing technical support to the UMEZ and opened the first biomedical research and development park in New York City. The University also established a program that hires and helps train community residents, and offers "forgivable" loans to employees as an incentive for home-buying within the Empowerment Zone. Columbia also administers academic, professional and service programs that assist thousands of upper Manhattan residents, school children and businesses.

The son of German immigrants, Dr. Rupp has also emphasized the global dimension of Columbia's work and sought to develop its role in international education and research. A number of new academic programs have been created with institutions abroad including the Law School's faculty exchange program with Tokyo University and its four-year double-degree program with the University of Paris; the first American undergraduate program with the Free University of Berlin; and the Center for Environmental Research and Conservation's programs with universities in Brazil, Indonesia and Belize.

Dr. Rupp's retirement closes 25 years of service as dean or president at a major university. Before assuming the presidency of Columbia in 1993, he led Rice University for eight years of successful growth, a period which saw the tripling of applications for admissions and a doubling of federal research support. Earlier, Dr. Rupp was the John Lord O'Brian Professor of Divinity and dean of the Harvard Divinity School. Under his leadership, the School's curriculum was revised to address more directly the pluralistic character of contemporary religious life. Further developments included new programs in women's studies and religion, Jewish-Christian relations, and religion and medicine.

Dr. Rupp's accomplishments place him in the company of such other illustrious presidents of Columbia as Nicholas Murray Butler and Dwight Eisenhower.

As a Columbia alumnus, I feel a heightened pride in my alma mater. As a New Yorker, I applaud Columbia's role in the cultural, intellectual and economic life of my city. I thank George Rupp for his masterful and dedicated service to one of the greatest institutions of one of the greatest cities of the world.

NATIONAL SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

HON. LAMAR S. SMITH

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 10, 2002

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, this week is National Small Business Week.

It is a time to celebrate the contributions that America's small businesses make to our economy.

Small business is the engine that drives this nation, producing 75 percent of new jobs, accounting for almost 98 percent of all employers and 53 percent of the private work force.

It is our small businesses that will continue to lead us to economic recovery.

In particular, small tech businesses are on the front lines of the digital revolution. They have led the way in advances from broadband deployment to software development.

My state of Texas ranks second nationally in high tech workers, employing more than 411,000 with an annual payroll of about $25 billion. Many of those employees are working for small businesses.

And my new congressional district contains thousands of small, innovative high tech centered businesses.

One such company is SecureInfo in San Antonio. SecureInfo was founded in 1994 and has 64 employees.

SecureInfo allows companies and government agencies to learn about and fix their existing cyber vulnerabilities before they can be exploited by hackers. Exploiting known vulnerabilities is the weapon of choice for cyber terrorists.

SecureInfo battles these electronic attackers with vulnerability intelligence methods that were developed while its founders were working for the United States Air Force Emergency Response Team.

SecureInfo is just one of the thousands of small technology businesses around the country connecting rural America, developing next generation hardware and software, protecting our electronic assets and keeping America on the forefront of technological advances.

NATIONAL NURSES WEEK

HON. MICHAEL FERGUSON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 10, 2002

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to rise today in recognition of National Nurses Week.

Every year, National Nurses Week is celebrated from May 6 to May 12, the birthday of Florence Nightingale, founder of nursing as a modem profession. During this week, we recognize the accomplishments and tireless efforts nurses make in order to improve our healthcare system.

Nurses are devoted to their profession and to people in need. They serve our country on the front lines of care in our doctor's offices, hospitals, clinics, nursing homes, and schools.

As we in Congress work to strengthen Medicare and ensure that all people have access to first class healthcare, we are reminded of the long hours of hard work that nurses endure, the sacrifices they make everyday to contribute to the health and well being of our communities.

With a large population of Americans aging, the continuing expansion of life-sustaining technology, and the explosive growth of home health care services, the nursing profession will become increasingly important. In fact, it is estimated that our country will need more than one million new nurses over the next decade. In order to encourage individuals to enter the nursing profession and support care for our loved ones, we must promote education programs, provide information to recruit individuals and highlight the role of nurses in the community.

As such, I ask you to join me in honoring nurses for their commitment to the principles we value. While they serve as the foundation of our Nation's healthcare system, nurses' dedication to their work and compassion for all patients exemplify the best of America's spirit.

TRIBUTE TO WALDO GIACOMINI

HON. LYNN C. WOOLSEY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 10, 2002

Ms. WOOLSEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Waldo Giacomini, a prominent West Marin citizen and rancher, who has just died at the age of 88. His life has left a strong imprint on the community.

Mr. Giacomini bought 1,100 acres of mudflats in 1944 which he developed into a thriving dairy. In January 2000, he sold the bulk of this property to the Golden Gate National Recreation Area for a nature preserve to be named the Waldo Giacomini Wetlands. In 1959 Mr. Giacomini co-founded the West Marin based organization, the Resource Conservation District, to promote good land stewardship in local agricultural areas by focusing on the prevention of erosion and water pollution.

He was also known for his participation in local organizations such as the West Marin Lion's Club, Sacred Heart Church, and Sonoma County Trailblazers and was supportive of cultural and service groups such as the Dance Palace Community Center and Papermill Creek Children's Comer, his neighbors in Point Reyes Station. He was frequently seen walking around the town, greeting his many friends.

A dedicated family man, Mr. Giacomini is survived by his four children as well as siblings, grandchildren, and great grandchildren, several of whom continue in the ranching business.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Giacomini leaves us a legacy of caring for the community he called home. In remembering his frequent rendition of the tune, "You are my Sunshine," I echo the words of that song in bidding him farewell: "(He) made us happy when skies were gray." Waldo Giacomini will be missed!

HONORING MR. JOSE AND MRS. ANTONIETA VARGAS ON THEIR 50TH WEDDING ANNIVERSARY

HON. XAVIER BECERRA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 10, 2002

Mr. BECERRA. Mr. Speaker, it is with utmost pleasure and privilege that I rise today to recognize two wonderful Americans, Mr. Jose and Mrs. Antonieta Vargas, on the joyous and momentous occasion of their fiftieth wedding anniversary. On May 3, 1952, Jose and Antonieta Vargas joined in holy matrimony and commenced their marvelous journey together, a journey which we celebrate and reflect upon today.

Jose Vargas was born on December 19, 1918, in El Paso, Texas, during the Mexican Revolution. His mother, Atilana Castillo de Vargas, had traveled to El Paso to escape the violence of the Revolution while his father, Guadalupe Vargas, stayed in Chihuahua, Mexico. Atilana returned to her home in Chihuahua with her children after the violence had ended. Jose completed six years of primary education before going to work in the mines of Chihuahua and on the railroad; he also became an accomplished carpenter. He is the second of six children; his elder sister, Natividad, and younger brother, Jesus, have passed away. His siblings Maximo, Lazaro, and Guadalupe live in Chihuahua and Los Angeles, California.

Antonieta Valverde was born in the mining town of Santa Eulalia in the Mexican state of Chihuahua on December 27, 1927, and was raised in Ciudad Chihuahua. She is the eldest of six children, including Leobardo, Alicia, Concepcion, Damaso and Berta. She completed college before going to work at the Coca Cola bottling facility in Chihuahua.

Jose and Antonieta met in their neighborhood, Santa Niño de Antocha, while riding the bus to their jobs. After a year-long courtship, they married and moved to El Paso, Texas, There, the first five of their children were born: Jose and Fernando in 1952, Jorge in 1954, Maria Antonieta in 1958, and Arturo in 1962. Fernando died shortly after birth.

In 1962, while working on a construction site, Jose was injured, falling from the second story of a building being razed. The family survived through the kindness and charity of neighbors and family. In 1964, Jose left for Los Angeles to find employment, and upon doing so, moved the family to the South Central and then the Pico-Union areas of the city. His brother Jesus and sister Guadalupe had already relocated there. In 1968, their youngest son, Rogelio, was born at East Los Angeles Doctor's Hospital.

Jose found employment as an unskilled laborer, and worked for many years at the Aerol Company in the community of Glassel Park. He worked as a driver and assembly line manufacturer. During this time, Antonieta dedicated herself to raising her children and maintaining the household of seven in a one-bedroom apartment. Though they endured years of financial hardship and personal sacrifice, their children today marvel at the realization that although they were poor, they never once wanted for food or shelter. They rejoiced in the abundance of love that these two devoted people brought to their home.

In 1974, after eldest sons Jose and Jorge had left for college, Jose and Antonieta became part of a group of parents called Padres Unidos who were dissatisfied with the quality of education and facilities offered at Magnolia Elementary School, which their children had attended or were attending. They protested, boycotted, and risked arrest demanding adequate facilities and a quality education for their children.

Soon afterward, Antonieta began her second career as a Title III Education Aide with the Los Angeles Unified School District. She worked for the school district from 1976 to 1996. Jose Vargas retired in 1988.

Today, Jose and Antonieta take joy in the success of their children and grandchildren.

Their eldest son, Jose, graduated from California State University at Northridge and the Physician Assistant Program at the Martin Luther King, Jr./Charles R. Drew Medical Center. He is married to Juanita Perez and they have two children, Joel, age 17, and Justene, age 14. Jose is a Physician Assistant with a private medical doctor and his wife, Juanita, is a public school teacher in Los Angeles.

Son Jorge is a graduate of Pepperdine University and Southwest University College of Law. He has worked as an attorney with the California Agricultural Labor Relations Board, the Monterey County District Attorney, and presently with the California State Compensation Board. He lives in Salinas, California with his wife, Diane Peña, and two sons, Nicholas, age 15, and Benjamin, age 11.

Daughter Maria Antonieta graduated from the University of California at Los Angeles, UCLA, where she was a leader in an overnight camping program for disadvantaged urban youth. She has been a senior manager in the private sector her entire career. An avid sports enthusiast, she lives in Long Beach, California.

Son Arturo graduated from Stanford University with bachelor's and master's degrees. He currently is the Executive Director of the National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials, NALEO, and resides in Los Angeles.

Youngest son Rogelio is a graduate of California State University at Northridge and a member of the Los Angeles City Fire Department. He is married to Kristin Fredrickson and has three children: Olivia, age 17 months, and three-month old fraternal twins, Daniela and Julia.

Today, Jose and Antonieta enjoy their retirement years in the Los Angeles community of Highland Park.

Mr. Speaker, as they embark upon the next fifty years of marriage, it gives me great pleasure to join family and friends who honor Jose and Antonieta Vargas with a commemorative mass and celebration on May 11, 2002. Jose and Antonieta exemplify what love, determination and honest, hard work bestow upon a marriage, a family, and the fortunate generations to follow. I ask my colleagues to join me in paying deserved tribute to two humble but immensely accomplished Americans.

THE NATIONAL DEFENSE AUTHORIZATION ACT FOR FISCAL YEAR 2003

SPEECH OF

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 9, 2002

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union had under consideration the bill (H.R. 4546) to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 2003 for military activities of the Department of Defense, and for military construction, to prescribe military personnel strengths for fiscal year 2003, and for other purposes:

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Chairman, later in this debate we will be considering an amendment by the Gentleman from Texas, Mr. PAUL relating to the International Criminal Court. I am perplexed by this amendment, since, if it were binding, it would undermine our ability to defend U.S. servicemen and women, protects war criminals, and express a profound distrust of the President of the United States. Although revising the amendment to make it non-binding was an improvement, the underlying policy suggested by the Amendment remains misguided.

Mr. Chairman, I understand that the Gentleman is opposed to the International Criminal Court, and this amendment is supposed to express that policy. Buy Mr. Chairman, that is already the policy of the United States. On Monday, the Administration announced that it would not ratify the Rome Statute which creates the Court, had given up on the court as a workable institution, and was not going to provide assistance to it.

On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, the language of this amendment simply goes too far and is fundamentally inconsistent with the national interest. In particular, the amendment provides that no funds may be used to "cooperate" with the court. Mr. Chairman, even opponents of the court should oppose this language. Let me give some examples of what the policy expressed in this amendment may prohibit:

It may prohibit the Defense Department from responding to the Court's investigators when they ask us for exonerating information on actions by U.S. Servicemen or women. Perversely, this would mean this amendment would make it more difficult for us to defend our own troops.

It may prevent us from allowing a member of the armed forces to testify on behalf of one of our NATO allies, who accept this treaty.

And it may prevent us from providing any information with respect to a prosecution of enemies of the United States. If a war crime is committed by Saddam Hussein in country which is a member of the court, and it does not prosecute him for political reasons, then under this amendment we could not help the Court prosecute Saddam.

Moreover, the subject of this amendment was already dealt with by the House in H.R. 1646, the State Department Authorization Act, which appears to be moving towards Conference. That is the proper venue for this topic.

Mr. Chairman, the President has announced his opposition to the Court. This amendment, represents an expression of profound distrust in our commander-in-chief. I think that in the middle of a war, that is the last thing we should be doing.

SENATE—Monday, May 13, 2002

(Legislative day of Thursday, May 9, 2002)

The Senate met at 3 p.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable HARRY REID, a Senator from the State of Nevada.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Dr. Lloyd John Ogilvie, offered the following prayer:

As we come into Your presence today, dear God, we recall the familiar words of Reverend Samuel Francis Smith:

"Our Fathers' God, to Thee,
Author of liberty,
To Thee we sing;
Long may our land be bright
With freedom's holy light;
Protect us by Thy might,
Great God, our King."

Thank You, Father, for this expression of resolute trust in You and for Your faithfulness in answering this prayer. As we honor different Americans who have enriched our history, we also remember the inspired English professor, Katherine Lee Bates, whose assurance of Your providence, in 1893, led her to write:

"America! America! God shed His grace on Thee; and crown thy good with brotherhood from sea to shining sea!"

In response, we open our lives to Your grace and renew our commitment to Your good as the measure of America's greatness. You are our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The Honorable HARRY REID led the Pledge of Allegiance, as follows:

> I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. BYRD).

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, DC, May 13, 2002.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, paragraph 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable HARRY REID, a Senator from the State of Nevada, to perform the duties of the Chair.

ROBERT C. BYRD,
President pro tempore.

Mr. REID thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEAHY). The deputy majority leader is recognized.

SCHEDULE

Mr. REID. Mr. President, the Senate will be in morning business for the next hour. At 4 o'clock, there will be a 2-hour debate on the nomination of Paul Cassell to be United States district judge. That time will be divided between the chairman of the committee, Senator LEAHY, and the ranking member, Senator HATCH, or their designees. The vote on the nomination will occur at approximately 6 o'clock this evening.

Mr. President, following disposition of the nomination, we will resume consideration of the trade bill. We have laid down the amendment on which we worked so hard for more than a day last week. That was laid down on Friday. It is now open for amendment. We hope people will come over and offer amendments.

The leader is interested in completing work on this bill, but he wants to make sure everyone has an opportunity to offer amendments. We hope that the amendments will be offered, that we can debate them, and vote on them. The leader would rather not have to file a cloture motion. I hope that is not necessary. And I am sure the majority leader also hopes that is not necessary. We ask Senators to be ready for some long nights this week in hopes of completing this bill in the immediate future.

RESERVATION OF LEADER TIME

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the leadership time is reserved.

MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 4 p.m., with Senators permitted to speak for up to 10 minutes each, with the time equally divided between the majority leader and the Republican leader or their designees.

The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to speak for up to 20 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RETIREMENT SECURITY FOR AMERICANS

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I have come to the Chamber today to speak about a subject that is of great importance to the people of my State, and I think people throughout the country, and that is the issue of retirement security.

We give a lot of speeches in the Senate about security: national security, homeland security—a variety of securities. We are concerned about security. The American people are concerned about security.

But there is one aspect of security that has not gotten a whole lot of attention so far in this Congress, and I am here today to call attention to it. That aspect of security is retirement security.

The collapse of Enron and the resulting collapse of the retirement plans of many Enron workers and plans across the country that held substantial amounts of Enron stock have underscored the need for changes in our pension laws and our retirement plan laws.

Frankly, I am disappointed that the House, in passing a watered-down version of the administration's modest proposals, has failed to increase retirement safety for those American workers who do have pensions, since that is all on which that bill really focuses.

The one proposal they should have watered down—that was the "conflicted adviser" provision in that bill—was left intact. It has the effect of removing one of the few protections in current law against conflicts of interest by financial service companies.

I am hoping the Senate will follow the lead of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee and also the Finance Committee and their respective chairs and provide a more meaningful piece of legislation drafted to protect the rights of workers instead of exposing them to greater risks. So that is an issue that has been brought to national attention because of the collapse of Enron.

At the same time I refer to that, let me say that an even more troubling trend is the fact that we have heard nothing from the administration and, really, in either House of Congress about the lack of pension coverage of any kind for large segments of our working population—both the lack of coverage and the substantial reduction in retirement wealth for most of the workers in this country.

Approximately 2 weeks ago, Dr. Edward Wolff of the Economic Policy Institute—he is a professor at New York University—presented his report entitled "Retirement Insecurity: The Income Shortfalls Awaiting the Soon-to-Retire." I would like to take a few minutes to highlight some of the points that were made in that report. I believe it makes the case, in a very compelling way, of the need for more attention to this issue for everyday workers.

The report and the most recent Department of Labor statistics demonstrate that retirement plan coverage has not increased in the past 30 years despite all of the efforts to expand coverage. Let me show a chart I have to make the case.

This shows the retirement plan coverage rates for full-time, private sector workers. You can see this covers the period 1972 to 1999. When you look at all workers, you see the retirement plan coverage rate for all workers in 1972 was 48 percent; in 1999—nearly 30 years later, 27 years later—it was 51 percent. So there has been a very modest increase, but modest indeed.

When you look at the figures for male workers, you see there has been an actual decline in the coverage rates for full-time, private sector male employees during that period, 1972 to 1999. Mr. President, 54 percent of male workers had pensions of some type. When I say "pensions," I include in that 401(k) plan participation; they had some kind of a plan where they were putting away money for retirement. It was 54 percent in 1972; 52 percent in 1999.

The percentage for women has improved because they were at 38 percent in 1972 and they are now at 49 percent. But it is substantially below where it ought to be.

That means roughly half of America's private sector employees will have to enjoy their retirement on the other two legs of the proverbial three-legged stool. Some who are listening may not be aware of this metaphor, but the three-legged stool is what people who focus on retirement circumstances are always referring to. They say: You have three legs you can depend upon for your retirement income; one is Social Security, the second is your savings, and the third is your pension.

What these statistics show is that one of those so-called legs that a person can depend upon in this so-called three-legged stool, the pension part, is not there for half of the workers in this country. In truth, my guess is that many private sector workers who do not have a pension or retirement plan probably do not have a second leg on that stool either because they do not have any significant savings. So they are essentially left with Social Security as their only real source of support after their retirement.

For minorities, the prospects are even dimmer. Unfortunately, the coverage for minorities is unacceptably low; it has been for a long time and continues. This chart makes the point for different groups of employees. For all workers in 1999, the percentage of private wage and salaried workers covered under their employer's pension plan was 44 percent. When you go down to Black, non-Hispanic workers, it was 41 percent; Asian and Pacific Islanders, non-Hispanic, 38 percent; others, minorities, non-Hispanic, 35 percent; and Hispanic workers, 27 percent. That last figure is important to me because 40 percent of the people in my State are Hispanic. This statistic indicates that only 27 percent of the private sector employees who are Hispanic in this country actually have a pension on which they can rely.

There has been an interesting shift I will point out. This comes out of Dr. Wolff's report. There has been a shift from defined benefit plans to defined contribution plans. Let me explain what that is. A defined benefit plan essentially guarantees that when the worker retires, they will receive a specific amount, a defined benefit, regardless of what has happened to the economy or to the investment, the retirement funds, or anything else in the interim while they were working.

In 1975, when you looked at all of these various pensions people had in the private sector, 71 percent of them were defined benefit plans and only 29 percent were defined contribution.

Defined contribution, of course, means the risk is much more on the employee. It does not guarantee you any particular payment on a monthly basis or a yearly basis once you retire. It says you put in a specified amount each month while you are working, and then at the end of your work time, we look to see what the investment of those funds has added up to and how much there is for you to actually get in the way of retirement. So there is much less risk on the employer, much more risk on the employee in a defined contribution plan.

The interesting thing about this chart is the defined benefit plans used to represent 71 percent of all pension plans; now they are 35 percent. The defined contribution plans used to represent 29 percent; they are now 65 percent. So there has been a dramatic shift away from defined benefits to defined contributions.

When this trend started, the case was made by those who advocated it that this was going to allow much greater expansion of pension coverage; we were going to be able to cover a great many more workers if we shifted to a defined contribution plan instead of a defined benefit plan. So we did. We had a dramatic shift from defined benefit plans to defined contribution plans. Unfortunately, there has not been any increase in the percentage of workers covered, as that earlier chart made the case very clearly.

One of the reasons many of these companies shifted to defined contribution plans is that the employee makes the majority of the contributions to the plan when it is defined contribution—not the employer but the employee. As I indicated before, the risk is shifted to the employee. The risk of the funds not being well invested and the investments not turning out well shifts to the employee rather than the employer.

Clearly, half of our private sector employees did not get any benefit out of this bargain because they don't have a pension of any kind from the start. As I am about to explain, it does not appear that a majority of the covered workers got much out of this either.

Let me put up a few more charts that are interesting. One which is hard to read is a chart that shows, State by State, the pension coverage we have in the private sector around the country. This is a chart that got my attention. You cannot read it from any distance, I am sure, but you can see that in Washington State, 45 percent of private sector workers have pension coverage. It is substantially better in some other States. In Vermont—the Presiding Officer has an interest in Vermont—40 percent of the private sector employees have some kind of pension. That means either some kind of defined contribution or defined benefit plan. They may have a 401(k). That would be in that 40 percent.

The reason this chart catches my attention is that if you go over this chart and look at all of the percentages, the State with the lowest percent is New Mexico. Twenty-nine percent of the private sector employees in my State actually have some kind of pension.

I have a chart I also want to put up for the attention of various Senators. It shows the percentage of private sector workers without pension coverage. It shows about the top 15 States. In New Mexico, 71 percent of the private sector employees, according to these statistics, don't have any kind of a pension; Louisiana, 69 percent; Nevada, 67 percent; Florida, 66 percent; Mississippi, 66 percent.

People might look at this and say, you are generally talking about southern, southwestern States, close to the border. There are all kinds of problems there with the economy.

Let's go to some others. I know my colleague from North Dakota is in the Chamber. According to this chart, 61 percent of the private sector employees in North Dakota do not have a pension. This is data from the employee benefits supplement to the Census Bureau statistics in 1993.

The national average, according to that period, in 1993, was 50 percent; South Carolina, 61 percent; in Texas, where our President was Governor, 62 percent did not have a pension.

The reason I point this out is to make the point that this is a real issue for a great many Americans. I know we have had people come to the floor and say—in fact, I think my colleague from Texas spoke a couple weeks ago and said the biggest economic issue that this Congress has to deal with is to make permanent the repeal of the estate tax. Well, to change the law as it will be 9 years from now, as relates to the estate tax, when I look at these statistics, I don't think that is the biggest economic issue from the point of view of the people I represent. We have other big economic issues, one of which is pension coverage.

At the same time that coverage rates were made flat and employees shifted towards the defined contribution plans, the retirement income of retirees and those nearing retirement has decreased as compared to their current incomes.

I have another chart that makes that point. Let me put it up. This is a chart that I think is very interesting because it deals with the issue of the share or percentage of households with an expected retirement income that is more than half of their current income. We are not suggesting that people in retirement are likely to have incomes equal to their current income. We are saying that once they retire we would like them to have incomes that are at least half of their current income.

In 1989, according to this chart, 70 percent of the people who were retiring had incomes that equaled half of their current income. So they had as much as a 50-percent reduction in their income, but it wasn't worse than that. In 1998, a couple years ago—the most recent year for which we have statistics—that dropped to 57 percent. So only 57 percent of households had an income that was half of their current income by that time.

So who are the winners? Who has benefited from all these changes that have occurred, according to Dr. Wolff's report? The data released in this report demonstrates that only those with retirement incomes of over a million dollars saw their retirement wealth, in 1999, increase as compared to their retirement wealth in 1982. This chart takes each of these different groups—if your wealth is $25,000, or if it is $25,000 to $49,999, $50,000 to $100,000, $100,000 to $250,000. And then the final part of the chart is a million dollars and over.

So if you have $1 million and over in your wealth, you have probably seen that increase during that period from 1983 to 1998. But if you are not in that income category and in that wealth category, then you did not.

So the conclusions from this report are pretty stark. Coverage rates have been stagnant. The percentage of our private sector workers that have coverage—some kind of pension—has been stagnant for several decades. Minorities still have worse coverage than nonminorities. There has been very little improvement in that regard. The promise of increased coverage due to the shift toward the defined contribution plans that we used to hear about has not occurred.

Finally, the relative wealth of almost all classes of retirees—that is, everybody except the people with wealth of over $1 million—decreased over the past two decades, even though we have seen a huge runup in the stock market. All of the statistics I have given you here are through 1998. We all know there was a booming stock market in the 1990s, up through 1998. The stock market has come down substantially—at least certain parts of it—in the last couple of years. None of that is reflected in any of these statistics. So we will have to get updated figures as quickly as they come out. But I don't want to suggest that I am taking last week's information in order to make the case. We are making the best case we can, assuming that the stock market did not drop, as we all know it did.

We will see a further erosion in retiree wealth when we get those updated statistics. It is time to start thinking about ways to improve coverage. We cannot let these trends continue. We need to talk about reducing and dealing with other issues than just the repeal of the estate tax, as we go through the rest of this Congress. We also have proposals, as I am sure the Presiding Officer knows, that suggest that the top priority for this Congress ought to be privatizing the Social Security system. That is the one remaining leg of the stool that exists which has not yet been whittled away.

These statistics make the case convincingly that at least that should be left alone and we should get about the business of trying to help people save for retirement and have a pension upon which they can depend.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota is recognized.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to speak as in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico raises a point that a lot of people are not talking about much. They talk about pension reform a lot around here but they fail to mention that a good many Americans have no pension.

The Senator from New Mexico used statistics—for example, 61 percent in my home State, and I think 70-some in New Mexico, have no pension. We should do pension reform, but we also ought to think through how do we encourage additional retirement savings and pensions to be offered to workers.

THE NEW FARM BILL

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, this morning the President signed the new farm bill into law. We worked long and hard on that. It was a long, tortured trail to get it done, but the importance of it cannot be understated.

In North Dakota, for example, the difference between the first Freedom to Farm bill—the current law—and this new farm bill is over $270 million in additional assistance during collapsed prices to family farmers. Now, that help is not just for family farmers; it shows up on many of our main streets and supports our jobs in a rural State such as North Dakota.

I cannot say strongly enough how important this bill is. It took us too long to get done, but it is done. I appreciate the work that all of us did together and the cooperation in the final analysis to get it to the President. I am pleased and relieved that this morning, finally, this bill is now signed into law.

SELLING FOOD TO CUBA

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, let me talk about two other issues briefly. One is a letter I received last Friday from Secretary of State Colin Powell. This relates to a decision by the State Department to cancel the visas for Cubans coming to our country to buy additional food. Since the hurricane, they have purchased over $70 million in American food. That is available for them to purchase because I and my colleague from Connecticut, Senator DODD, and others changed the law to allow food sales to Cuba. Strangely enough, they have to pay in cash and do it through a French bank; nonetheless, they can finally buy American food.

We ought never use food as a weapon, and we have done it for 40 years with Cuba. That is over. They are now buying food from this country. We had a group of people representing Alimport, including Pedro Alvarez and others, coming to this country to buy food. They were coming, in fact, to North Dakota and they were going to buy dried beans and wheat. They were granted a visa by the State Department, and then immediately that visa was revoked. I asked Secretary Powell, "By what authority was it revoked and why?"

Let me use a couple of charts to see what happened on this issue. This is a news story about it:

> A State Department official confirmed Wednesday that the administration policy is not to encourage sales of food to Cuba.

In the letter from Secretary Powell, he disavows that, but that is what they told us: It is our policy not to encourage food sales to Cuba. I said it is a brainless policy to decide you do not want to sell food to Cuba; you ought to sell food to Cuba. We sell it to China, a Communist country. We sell it to Vietnam, a Communist country. And we are told we do not want to sell food to Cuba? Does anybody think Fidel Castro has not eaten a meal along the way because we had an obstruction on the sale of food to Cuba? No, it just hurts sick people, poor people, and hungry people. This is what this policy has represented.

At a hearing last week when I raised this question with Secretary Powell, he said: I have never heard of this policy not to encourage food sales to Cuba. In fact, he said additional sales should be encouraged so long as American farmers benefit.

The Farm Bureau said the cancellation of Mr. Alvarez's visa will adversely affect the sale of corn, rice, wheat, poultry, soybeans, lentils, and eggs, valued at $35 million.

I received a four-page letter from Secretary Powell. Frankly, it does not answer any of the questions. It says Mr. Alvarez's visa was revoked because of a 1985 then-President Ronald Reagan directive. He also said: Mr. Alvarez was here once before and he lobbied to undermine the U.S. embargo. I guess when he was here before, he said Cuba would like to have a circumstance where they could buy food from American farmers. The State Department considers that undermining America's interest. Give me a break. Mr. Secretary, that does not undermine anything. I hope the State Department and others will pay a little more attention to the issue of terrorists getting bombs, not Cubans buying dried beans and wheat.

The subcommittee which I chair is going to hold a hearing, and I will ask the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Reich, to come to Congress and explain who decided to revoke these visas.

TRADE AUTHORITY

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, I wish to speak to the underlying legislation we will be on following the vote on the judgeship this afternoon. That is the trade bill. We are going to be discussing once again so-called fast-track trade authority. I am not going to support the bill, but I do have some amendments.

I think fast track is fundamentally undemocratic. Our trade deficit is ballooning; it is now over $450 billion in merchandise trade deficits. And every time we have had a new agreement, we have been injured further.

I am going to offer several amendments to fast track when it is before the Senate. One deals with wheat from Canada. The unfairly subsidized wheat coming in from Canada has injured our farmers in a dramatic way. The International Trade Commission says this wheat trade is unfair, and the trade ambassador, to his credit, says it is unfair. But there is no specific remedy. It is a five-point remedy in the sweet by-and-by; we will never quite get to it.

My amendment will say we want specific remedies identified and reported to us within 6 months of what the trade ambassador is going to do to take specific action and remedy the unfair wheat trade that exists with Canada and the unfair trade that exists in other markets with respect to Canada. That is No. 1.

No. 2, this administration is proposing on June 30 to allow long-haul Mexican trucks into this country. That is in contravention of everything Congress debated just months ago on this issue. I am going to offer an amendment that tries to stop that.

Mr. President, you know and I know and everyone in this country knows Mexican truckdrivers are not driving with the same safety requirements imposed in Mexico that we impose in this country. They do not have the same safety inspections. They do not have the same requirements with respect to length of service or hours of service or logbooks. I ask everyone to read the newspaper accounts of people riding with Mexican long-haul truckers, and you will discover the truckers drove continuously for 24 hours or drove unsafe equipment.

The fact is this administration on June 30 is going to allow those long-haul Mexican trucks to come into this country to do long hauls, and that is wrong, it is unsafe, and it ought not happen.

The safety requirements the Senate would have imposed some months ago when we debated this issue are nowhere near in place. The inspection stations do not exist. The compliance and enforcement requirements in Mexico do not exist. The fact is, we are going to have American families driving up and down American streets and highways with long-haul Mexican trucks and no one is going to know whether that driver has been driving 24 straight hours or driving a rig with faulty brakes because it has not been inspected. I am going to offer an amendment on that issue.

In addition, I am going to offer an amendment dealing with Cuba, and that amendment will impose the same circumstances that were dropped out of the agriculture conference just last week. The amendment is very simple. It says when Cuba buys grain from our country, it ought not have to pay cash through a French bank; it ought to be able to buy grain with commercially accepted credit from our country.

I am going to support the Dayton-Craig amendment which is very important. Our trade negotiators are prepared to negotiate away antidumping authority, the ability on behalf of our producers to remedy trade that is unfair because someone else is dumping into our marketplace. If we eliminate the antidumping remedies, we will put our producers in desperate trouble. Their amendment is right on point. I intend to ask to cosponsor that amendment, and I will be very supportive of it.

I also will be supportive of an amendment to be offered by Senator DURBIN and will ask to be a cosponsor of that. That amendment deals with labor and environmental standards with respect to trade. The issue for this country should continue to be this: We want people to access the American marketplace, to give the American consumer the widest range of goods from all around the world, but we want it, when those goods come in as a result of trade, to be fair trade.

We do not want goods that come from prison labor in China. We do not want goods to come into our marketplace that are made by 12-year-old kids working 12 hours a day being paid 12 cents an hour. That is not fair trade. It is not what this country ought to support, and it is not what we ought to allow into our marketplace.

Conditions of fair trade are very important, and as we discuss trade in this Chamber with the advent of the fast track debate, it is very important for us to say to the American people that there is an admission price to the American economy, and the admission price to other countries is that their markets must be open to us and their markets and laws must represent fair trade with this country. That is not a standard that now exists.

I do not want to put a wall around our country. I believe in expanded trade. I believe in greater trade opportunity. But I believe also this country needs to have the spine and the backbone to stand up for its own economic interest and demand that trade be fair trade.

That will represent the several amendments I will be offering and supporting, including the three I mentioned I will be offering soon.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who seeks recognition?

The senior Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I commend my colleague from North Dakota for several comments he made. I particularly commend him for his comments about the issue regarding Cuba and how we might do a better job than we have over the past 40 years of bringing democracy to that country.

After 40 years of failed policies, one might think a new approach would be in order. I take note as well that as we speak today, a former President of the United States, President Carter, is in Cuba speaking to dissidents and human rights activists, as well as members of the Government of Cuba. That kind of exposure, that kind of engagement is going to do more to bring about the change we want to see in Cuba than the insistence of a failed policy we have followed for the past four decades.

I commend my colleague from North Dakota for his comments.

INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I wish to take a few minutes to express my deep disappointment at the announcement made last week by Under Secretary of State John Bolton with respect to the "unsigning," as they have called it, of the International Criminal Court. This decision, in my view, is irresponsible, it is isolationist, and contrary to our vital national interest.

Many of our closest allies—in fact, every one of our NATO allies—has put their faith and vision in this new legal instrument, the International Criminal Court. To date, 66 nations have ratified the International Criminal Court and over 130 nations have signed on to this particular effort, including those nations I mentioned—all of our NATO allies—countries such as France, Germany, the United Kingdom, and the like. These are governments with deep ties to our Nation. We share a deep sense of common values, a deep sense of democracy, and a deep sense of justice.

It is outrageous that the United States has now put itself in a position of joining only a handful of rogue nations that are frightened to death of the International Criminal Court as we enter the 21st century. We should be joining these countries and supporting them in their commitment to making the Court work and strengthening international respect for the rule of law. That is what we stand for as Americans. That is what we are trying to export around the world. In addition, we try to export the notion of justice, of fair justice, such as the symbols we see outside this building a block away: The Supreme Court, Justice blindfolded with the scales equally divided.

That is what we have stood for as a nation for more than two centuries. What a great shame it is that as we enter the 21st century, in an effort to establish an international criminal court of justice, the Bush administration is going to "unsign" a document, a treaty, that I think would have gone a long way to helping us achieve the very goals incorporated in the Treaty of Rome.

We should have been rejoicing that finally with the entry and divorce of the court, any individual who commits genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity would be on notice that he or she would be prosecuted for those offenses. I find it disheartening there is a lack of historical perspective when it comes to this issue. Let's remember it was the atrocities of World War II, the Holocaust, that lead to the establishment of the Nuremberg Tribunal to bring those who committed such acts of violence and human rights violations to justice, which highlighted the fact that there was a void in the international legal system. Those who participated in the Nuremberg process came to believe strongly that a permanent international criminal court should be established to try future heinous international criminals. The hope was that the existence of such a court would also serve as a deterrent to those who might consider committing such crimes.

Unfortunately, the proposal floundered during 50 years of superpower rivalry, but the United States kept arguing that we ought to do this, through Republican and Democratic administrations. Conservatives, liberals, moderates all suggested and all argued at one time or another for the importance of the establishment of such a court.

I have no doubt that such a court would have been extremely useful had it existed during the last quarter of the 20th century. It should still be fresh in our minds the fact that the end of the cold war, and the explosion of ethnic brutality led to the necessity of creating ad hoc tribunals for Rwanda and Yugoslavia, but there was no means available for trying the Idi Amins and Saddam Husseins of this world, or others who have been able to evade their nation's justice. With very few exceptions, the world has stood helpless in the face of such crimes against humanity.

Had the court existed, it just might have deprived these tyrants of the safe havens from prosecution. It just might have deterred some of the worst atrocities and also prevented the U.S. service members from being sent into harm's way to reestablish the rule of law.

President Clinton, to his credit, appreciated that fact, and that is why he signed the treaty. He was not starry-eyed about it. However, he recognized that additional safeguards with respect to the operation of the court were needed in order to reassure those skeptical about the international organization, and he rightly decided that since the court was still a work in progress, and given the role of the United States as a leader in the promotion of the rule of law, that it was in the national interest of the United States to remain engaged with our allies as they moved forward to bring the Rome statute into force.

Some in the United States harbor the unreasonable fear that Americans will be taken before this tribunal on politically motivated charges, fears that I believe are unfounded but fears that have not been dispelled with the erasing of our signature. U.S. men and women in uniform are no safer today than they were before Monday's announcement. In fact, I argue they are in greater jeopardy because the court, as it is presently construed, does have flaws because we disengage from rewriting the court to try to establish better rules—the court is going into existence in a matter of weeks. Whether we signed it or not, it is becoming the international rule of law, and today that court could have been stronger had we decided to remain engaged in helping frame the structure of the institution.

These men and women in uniform may be in some jeopardy, and my hope would be they would not, but had we stayed engaged in this process, we could have eliminated even that slight possibility. Moreover, to the best of my knowledge, what we have done with respect to the ICC, the "unsigning" of a treaty, is without precedent. I am sure there are legal scholars on diplomacy that can correct me if I am wrong, but I cannot find a single example in the more than two centuries of history where an American President has unsigned an agreement.

Think of the precedent-setting nature of that act. Let's be clear: The U.S. withdrawing its signature, if it can so be done, does not annul the court. In fact, it does not do that at all. But it would encourage other nations to remove their signatures from treaties that are vital to U.S. interests, and they will cite the example of an American President who unsigned a treaty for which he did not particularly care.

The fear in Washington is that American soldiers abroad, as I said, would be charged unjustly with war crimes. Such a possibility is very remote. The court already contains strong safeguards that ensure it will deal only with the most serious of international crimes and can take a case only if a nation's own judicial system has declined to carry out a conscientious investigation of the charges.

Does anyone really believe that in this country we would not pursue a person in uniform who had committed heinous crimes to come before a bar of justice?

The Rwandan and former Yugoslavian tribunals, which have rendered fair and reasonable judgments, show that America has little to fear from such a court. The Clinton administration negotiators were able to significantly improve the court's rules. Continued engagement, as I said a moment ago, by the Bush administration could have built upon that record.

One would have thought it was in the interest of the United States not to miss a chance to affect the selection of judges in the definition of new crimes, issues that should matter to us and to our allies. Apparently that is not the case.

A few weeks ago, on April 11, governments gathered in New York to mark what they called the depositing of the 66th instrument of ratification of the Rome statute, meaning that the international criminal court will come into existence this July. The court is going to exist and, unfortunately, we are going to be on the outside.

We have made further announcements we will not even support or assist the court as it tries to gather information against those who may have committed these dreadful crimes that the court would have jurisdiction over.

I am deeply disturbed by this action. I think it is a huge mistake. What are the implications of this course the Bush administration has set for the United States? The United States no longer can credibly voice its opinion on who should be selected to be the court's judges and prosecutors, nor will we be taken seriously if we attempt to use our seat in the U.N. Security Council to refer situations to the court, such as the current conflict in Sudan that has already claimed over 2 million lives as a result of war crimes, genocide, and crimes against humanity.

Finally, our words will fall on deaf ears when we purport to act as an unbiased watchdog of the court's integrity having denounced its fundamental purposes. We have also lost the opportunities that ensure the court stays focused on its primary task, that of bringing to justice the world's worst criminals.

I have cited a number of vital American interests that are wrapped up in this institution, the court. Those interests are not going to be erased with the name of the United States gone from the Rome statute. The administration may have struck a responsive cord with a right-wing antimultilateralist constituency with this announcement, but it has jeopardized the interests of all Americans in so doing.

The administration could have taken the higher road, the responsible road, recognizing that there is a constructive and useful role the United States could perform without making a decision at this juncture concerning U.S. ratification. Sadly, President Bush has chosen not to do so.

While some may be cheering the administration's decision, those of us who care deeply about promoting the rule of law are not. The issue has particular significance for me. My father, Thomas Dodd, was an executive trial counsel at Nuremberg in 1945 and 1946. The Nuremberg trials of the leading Nazi war criminals following World War II was a landmark of the struggle to deter and punish crimes of war and genocide, setting the stage for the Geneva and genocide conventions. It was also largely an American initiative.

Today, instead of America being a leader in the pursuit of global justice, we would act to throw up roadblocks toward that goal. Make no mistake about it, today was a setback in the promotion of global justice. Today was a setback for what America is supposed to stand for, and I regret this decision very deeply indeed.

TERRORISM INSURANCE

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I note the presence of the distinguished Senator from Nevada who has spoken to me on numerous occasions about the efforts to get a bill passed dealing with terrorism insurance. In his State, and I think particularly Las Vegas, major construction efforts have been slowed down tremendously because of the inability to acquire terrorism insurance. We have been very close since last fall in coming to an agreement to bring up a bill and to allow a series of amendments to be offered, debated, disposed of, and then to move on to reconcile the differences with the House-passed bill so that we might eliminate this roadblock that is causing a slowdown in economic growth in this country.

I hope my colleagues on the other side—I have worked very closely with Senator GRAMM of Texas, with the minority leader, the Republican leader, TRENT LOTT, to try to come up with a framework that can work. On this side of the aisle, Senator DASCHLE, our Democratic leader, along with Senator SCHUMER and others who have been interested in the subject matter, we have received unanimous consent—my colleague from Nevada can correct me if I am wrong on this side to move forward with a proposal allowing for a series but limited number of amendments, to a defined period of time to be considered and then final passage of a bill. There have been objections filed on the other side so we have not been able to proceed.

Let there be no doubt, there is 100-percent agreement on this side of the aisle to move to the terrorism insurance bill. Every day we wait, a day delayed is a job lost, a project gets stalled and the economy suffers. This is a serious issue. We ought to be able to get to a bill, consider amendments, let there be a decision by this body whether to support or reject amendments, get to final passage and try to resolve this issue.

To those who call my office on an hourly basis wondering whether we will get a terrorism insurance bill, let me be as clear as I possibly can: There is no objection on this side of the aisle; there is on the other.

My hope is we can resolve the objections. This has gone on week after week after week. There is no reason we cannot define amendments, allow for their consideration, allow for their disposition, and get to the third reading and final passage of a bill. My hope is that will happen this week so we can resolve the differences with the House and send a bill to the President for his signature.

Mr. REID. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DODD. I am happy to yield.

Mr. REID. I say to my friend, he is absolutely right. We have worked hard under the direction and guidance of the Senator from Connecticut and gotten everyone to sign off on a package we can bring to the floor. The other side wanted two amendments and then four amendments; and we have agreed. It seems to me we cannot let the perfect be the enemy of the good. It needs to be done.

I am sure the Senator would agree, if someone has a problem, propose floor amendments, we will debate and vote and move on. This has become serious. The Senator from Connecticut has had developers in his office, the people who lend money and want to lend money, people in the construction business, in addition to the specialized construction business, in addition to developers. I can go through a list of others who have been to see us who are extremely concerned about our country, in addition to their businesses.

I have heard on a number of occasions the majority leader acknowledging the work of the Senator on this issue, and I join with him. We need to nudge this forward a bit more and get this matter resolved. Time is wasting. In another 10 days we will be taking a week break to go home for the Memorial recess, and then the Fourth of July. In the meantime, there are construction projects not going forward.

Mr. DODD. I thank the Senator for his comments. He is exactly right. In addition to the organizations he mentioned, this means jobs. Business cannot get lending from the banks because the banks will not lend money without terrorism insurance. There is no proposal that allows us to bridge the gap since September 11.

It is very difficult to get this insurance because it is very difficult to price. Prior to the events of September 11 we had some acts of terrorism, but they were isolated and limited. What happened on September 11 has changed so many aspects of this country, including the question of how to calculate the cost of terrorism insurance.

Banks do not want to lend money. This is a practical matter. I wish it were otherwise. They do not want to lend money when the terrorism insurance will not be written, and it will not get written because people do not know how to price or cost it.

The idea was to frame some proposal to allow a bridge for a couple of years while the pricing of this product could be calculated, and to get the Federal Government out of it altogether but have us presently involved as a backstop should some catastrophic event occur. We would have a backstop so it would not wipe people out.

I am told today that if we have an event such as September 11 again, the insurance that exists today could only deal with about 20 percent of the cost of what happened on that day. Knowing that, we begin to understand why banks are not lending the money; why, then, developers, contractors, and so forth, are not going forward with their projects; and why people are being laid off. We have a ripple effect. That is the reason we need this bill.

I am not suggesting this is a perfect bill. But we do believe this proposal provides that gap for 23–36 months to allow for the pricing and free market factors to take over the costing out of terrorism insurance. In the absence of that happening, we get further delays. All the insurance contracts are being rewritten this year.

It is a major economic issue, one that cries out for an answer. I urge my colleagues on the other side not to hold this up any longer and not object to moving forward. If Members have a proposal, come forward and we will accommodate that amendment and vote on it one way or the other but don't stop the bill from moving forward altogether.

That is what is happening today and what has gone on for several months. It is causing great economic damage to the country. Talk to any major financial institution, talk to any major insurance company in this country, and they will say the same thing. The Republican objections to going forward on this bill are costing this country dearly. We need them to lift those objections, consider this bill, up or down, vote it up or down, but move on. Quit objecting to moving forward.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXTENSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the period for morning business be extended until 5:30 p.m. today under the same conditions and limitations of the previous order; that at 5:30, the Senate proceed to Executive session as under the previous order, with the time equally divided and controlled; that the remaining provisions of the previous order in Executive session remain in effect, without further intervening action or debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I have spoken to my friend, the Senator from Wyoming, Mr. THOMAS. When he completes his statement, we will go into recess, subject to the call of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming.

MEDICARE EQUITY FOR VETERANS ACT

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I will discuss a bill we have introduced in the last several weeks that I think is very important. It is called the Medicare Equity for Veterans Act of 2002. It is designed to provide some fairness between Medicare and VA health care. There are a number of Members who have introduced the bill that will require Medicare services to reimburse the VA facilities for services rendered to certain Medicare-eligible veterans. These service men and women have paid into Social Security and Medicare as have the rest of us but are prohibited from utilizing the program when they are treated at a VA facility. It is only fair that they be allowed to use their Medicare coverage in the private sector or at a VA facility.

An interesting thing has happened in the numbers with respect to veterans. The number of veterans enrolled in VA health care systems has more than doubled since 1996. Many VA facilities-eligible veterans, called priority 7, or category C veterans, being veterans who have served but their disabilities are not related to their military service and are able, financially, to care for themselves. This is where we have seen the greatest increase in the patient load.

At the VA facility in Cheyenne, WY there were only 131 of these priority 7 veterans who were treated in fiscal year 1997.

However, in fiscal year 2001, the same facility treated over 2,200 priority 7 veterans. So, clearly, the VA is experiencing substantial growth in that area and it is utilizing facilities—and that is good.

But the veterans are unable, even though they are eligible, to use their Medicare assistance. With this increase in numbers, unfortunately, the VA health care system has not kept pace in terms of its finances. In my State, Medicare would expand access to services in most communities and would provide primary care to those for whom it is not now available.

Specifically, the Medicare Equity for Veterans Act of 2002 establishes a 3-year demonstration program at 10 VA sites, 3 of which must be in rural areas. The Secretary of VA and HHS will either choose a Medicare+Choice or preferred provider option model for these sites. The options would give the Secretary some flexibility in that way.

We have more and more veterans who are in this category 7 who would like very much to use VA facilities to care for their needs. They are eligible for Medicare, and Medicare would then reimburse the VA. We would be able to do two things, of course: to be able to finance the VA facilities and at the same time be able to let these eligible veterans use their Medicare services.

I hope we can move this bill. I think it will be very good for VA veterans. I think it will also be good for Medicare. It can probably be done more cheaply than the private sector. The combination is a good remedy to some of the problems we have.

I yield the floor.

RECESS

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent the Senate stand in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 4:02 p.m., recessed until 4:33 p.m. and reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. LEVIN).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

NOMINATION OF PAUL CASSELL

Mr. KYL. Mr. President, I will speak in morning business but really on the subject of our 6 o'clock vote, the nomination of Paul Cassell to be judge for the district court serving the State of Utah.

I am not from Utah, obviously. And you might ask, what is an Arizona Senator doing speaking on behalf of a nominee from another State? The answer to that question is, I have gotten to know Paul Cassell, and I am a very big fan of Paul Cassell. I think he will do a superb job on the bench. I just want to take a couple minutes of my colleagues' time to explain why.

It is not often we have the opportunity, as Senators, to vote for a nominee, who we really have gotten to know in our work in the Senate, to serve as a district judge in another State. But Paul Cassell has testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee and has worked many hours with Senator FEINSTEIN and myself and some other Senators in helping to craft the victims' rights constitutional amendment.

You can have a view either for or against that amendment, but Professor Laurence Tribe from Harvard and Professor Paul Cassell from the University of Utah are the two legal professors, constitutional scholars, who have helped us most. They may represent different points on the political spectrum perhaps, but in terms of their legal scholarship and their ability to work together in helping us to craft this amendment, they have performed a magnificent service.

Again, whatever one thinks of the particular amendment, you cannot deny that these two professors have contributed significantly to the work of the Senate and, therefore, to the American people as a result of their work.

Let me just tell you a little bit about Professor Cassell first and then talk about his work on behalf of victims of crime. As I say, that is one of the primary reasons I am so supportive of him.

As I said, he is a member of the facility at the University of Utah College of Law where he teaches criminal procedure and evidence and some other courses as well.

He has published over 25 Law Review articles, as well as major op-eds and various periodicals.

Before entering academia, Professor Cassell served as an assistant U.S. attorney in the Eastern District of Virginia and as Associate Deputy Attorney General at our Department of Justice.

He clerked for then-Judge Antonin Scalia in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit and then for Chief Justice Warren Burger of the U.S. Supreme Court.

Those of us familiar with these facts know if you are able to clerk for both a member of the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals and then for the Chief Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, you are a law student graduate with something on the ball. Certainly, Professor Cassell fits that category.

He received his J.D. in 1984 from Stanford University, where he was Order of the Coif and president of the Stanford Law Review.

So his academic credentials and his postacademic career have been outstanding.

He tried a number of cases when he was assistant U.S. attorney. As a matter of fact, he prosecuted 17 felony jury trials, and some of them were very famous cases. I will let others talk about those cases. But one of the most interesting things to me that Professor Cassell did—purely without pay; as a volunteer—was to represent the victims of the Oklahoma City bombing case.

You may ask, why did the victims in the Oklahoma City bombing case need representation? You can imagine, having as many victims as there were in that case—people who were either injured in the bombing or the families of people who were killed, all wanting to be involved or participate in some way in that case, including even just the ability to be in the courtroom—it was a major battle.

As a matter of fact, the judge in that case—not once but twice—ruled that the families of the victims did not have a right to be in the courtroom during the trial. This was not because there were so many people that they could not all fit into the courtroom, although that was another issue, but the reason the court ruled that way was that the defense had argued it would be prejudicial to the defense, to the defendants, if the victims or their families were actually in the courtroom during the trial. Never mind that a judge always has the ability to say: Everybody will be motionless, will show no emotion, will behave themselves; and if they do not, then I will toss them out of the courtroom. That was not good enough in this case.

We in Congress passed a law saying: You have to let the people who were victims of the Oklahoma City bombing case sit in the courtroom. The case went back to the judge, and again the judge said no. One of the reasons he said no had to do with the reason for the victims' rights constitutional amendment, which I will not go into now, but basically he said the defendants' rights are in the U.S. Constitution, and the mere statute of Congress cannot override that. So these victims are going to have to have special rights. They are going to have to be in the Constitution. That is another argument, as I said.

But Paul Cassell, out of the goodness of his heart, represented all the victims in that case. I think the victims I have talked to would tell you, to a person, they were extraordinarily indebted to Paul Cassell for his service to them in that case.

There is much more I could say about this individual. Paul Cassell is a decent person who believes very strongly in the rights of both defendants and victims in the courtroom. He has served as a prosecutor for the United States of America and, therefore, has represented our Government in many cases against some truly bad felons. He has experience on the criminal side and on the civil side and has experience as a law professor, teaching not only constitutional law but evidence. That makes him uniquely qualified to go from where he is now to the bench.

It is not often that we find people who have this wide array of experience willing to serve on the Federal district court. It is much too easy in today's world for lawyers to make good money in the practice of law. But it is obvious that Paul Cassell has never been interested in just making money. He has wanted to serve, first, the people of the United States of America as an assistant U.S. attorney and then through his professorship to serve victims of crime and others on a purely pro bono basis.

We have a unique person who not only is extraordinarily well qualified from his academic experience and the breadth of his practice experience but who also has demonstrated a desire to serve the people. For a person as young to have that kind of commitment and to be willing to go on the Federal district court is unique and certainly should cause us to vote for his confirmation.

I know him personally. We couldn't do better than to confirm Paul Cassell to serve on the Federal district court in the State of Utah. I commend my colleagues to support his confirmation when we vote in a little over an hour.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FAST TRACK TRADE AUTHORITY

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the Bush administration continues its push for fast track trade authority under the fictitious term "trade promotion authority." This is legislation that would enable the President to negotiate trade agreements without full congressional input. With fast track authority, there would be only limited Senate debate. With fast track authority the full Senate will have no opportunity to amend. Most Members of Congress will have no opportunity to protect the interests of the people, the communities, and the industries of their particular States, including ensuring the protection of the standard of living of our workers and their families within those States and communities.

Although the Constitution clearly gives Congress the duty—and the power, it gives Congress the power—"to regulate commerce with foreign nations," with fast track authority the Congress will simply applaud a presidential trade-negotiating effort by approving a trade agreement, or boo the effort by disapproving it. That is pretty unlikely, that it would be disapproved.

Members of Congress should never allow our options to be so restricted. We were sent here to promote and to protect the interests of our States as well as the national good, and those goals are best served by debate and amendment, particularly with regard to trade deals.

The workers of this Nation are losing ground, in large part, due to poor trade agreements. For Congress to abdicate its constitutional authority here is to, in my view, turn its back on millions of American workers—the workers who are the backbone of this Nation, and who deserve more than a cursory, neglectful wink and nod.

Let us focus for a moment on just one sector of our economy, manufacturing. There is no question that manufacturing has continued to grow during the past several decades. For example, real, inflation adjusted, manufacturing sales as a percentage of GDP continue to increase.

And there is no question that certain manufacturing industries such as those involved in high-technology products—for example, electronic equipment, industrial machinery, and chemicals—have prospered.

United States production of electronic equipment rose by nearly 400 percent—to be precise, 393.5 percent—while industrial machinery increased by 155 percent. Even fabricated metal products and motor vehicles have experienced an increase in real output since 1990.

There is also no question that in recent decades a number of our vital industries could be placed on an endangered species list. Beginning in the 1970s and continuing through the 1990s, for too many American industries the story of American manufacturing has been a tragic story of bankruptcies, consolidations, plant closings, plant shutdowns, and movement overseas. These industries missed the economic boom of the 1990s because they have been drowning in a flood of cheap imports.

Since 1997, 33 steel companies have filed for bankruptcy, affecting 73,000 workers.

During the 1990s, 352 paper mills and paper converting plants permanently closed. Last year alone, 36 mills closed, and 15 more are slated for closing this year.

The American textile industry is suffering its worst crisis since the Great Depression of the 1930s. During the past year, more than 10 American textile mills have closed, and industrial giants such as Burlington Industries, Malden Mills, and Guilford Mills have sought bankruptcy protection.

Between 1989 and 2000, the real dollar value of apparel industry output failed by nearly 20 percent—19.6 percent to be exact. There was a 27.9-percent decline in the instruments industry and a 3.7-percent decline in the real output of the paper products industry.

According to the Congressional Research Service, at least 18 American industries experienced negative or slow output growth between the years 1980 and 2000—so much so that each one could be added to the endangered industries list.

The decline in these industries is reflected, to some extent, in the decline in employment in the manufacturing industries. In 1970, approximately one-third of the private sector workforce was engaged in manufacturing. By 2000, it had fallen to 17 percent.

So from 1970 to 2000, employment in the manufacturing industries fell from one-third of the private sector workforce to 17 percent—half—from 33 percent to 17 percent. Cut in half. That is like the wisest man of all time threatening to cut the baby in half.

According to the Congressional Research Service, at least 19 industries—nearly all in manufacturing—experienced the loss of one-third or more jobs since 1980. There was a 52-percent decrease in machine tools, a 67-percent decrease in employment in blast furnaces and steel mills, and an 83-percent decrease in employment in nonrubber footwear. Read it and weep.

I realize that a substantial portion of this decline in manufacturing employment is due to increased productivity. Millions of workers are losing their jobs because of technological progress, more efficient management of resources, and because productivity has grown faster than sales. Nevertheless, there is no question but that certain sectors of our economy—especially those in the industries I have mentioned—are being clobbered by imports.

Between 1994 and 2000, the U.S. trade deficit of $182 billion increased 141.6 percent to $439 billion—inflation adjusted 2000 dollars. This soaring trade deficit has taken an incredible toll on American jobs. Between 1994 and 2000, according to an analysis by the Economic Policy Institute, trade deficits eliminated a net total of 3 million actual and potential jobs from the U.S. economy.

The manufacturing sector has shouldered the burden of this increased deficit, as the manufacturing trade deficit rose by 158.5 percent. Of the 3 million trade-related job losses between 1994 and 2000, 1.9 million were in manufacturing. This means that nearly two of every three lost jobs were in manufacturing. In other words, 1.9 million jobs out of 3 million jobs were in manufacturing. That is, manufacturing constituted 65 percent of all trade-related job losses.

These trade-related job losses happened as increased globalization encouraged American industries to pack up and seek other lands where labor is cheaper and where industries do not have to comply with the environmental and safety standards in the United States. The International Trade Commission has reported that roughly half of the total productive capacity in the apparel industry has shifted from developed countries to less developed countries over the past three decades, where workers earn far less than their American counterparts.

What are we doing? What are we doing in our trade agreements to protect American jobs? The answer has to be: Not enough.

Globalization has also left our industries more vulnerable to the unfair predatory trade practices of foreign countries. Look at the American steel industry, which has been absolutely devastated by the dumping of cheap foreign steel and of government-subsidized, imported steel. Last October, the U.S. International Trade Commission ruled that imports of foreign steel have indeed caused serious injury to American steelmakers. The Commission reported that imported steel has seriously hurt domestic steelmakers in about half of 33 product lines examined, covering about 80 percent of what steel companies produce in America.

"Fifty years of foreign government intervention in the global steel market"—someone said last month in announcing tariffs on imported steel—"has resulted in bankruptcies, serious dislocation, and job loss." Who was that someone? The President of the United States, President Bush.

NAFTA, which was enacted under fast-track authority, and which I voted against, was supposed to eliminate most of these causes of the American trade deficit and lessen the foreign assaults upon American industries. Instead, the increased globalization unleashed under NAFTA and the World Trade Organization has exacerbated the problem, not solved it. I have been on the right side in both instances; I have opposed both. Since 1994, when NAFTA created the free trade zone, North Carolina has lost more than 125,500 jobs in the textile and apparel industries, or 47 percent of the workforce.

The Mississippi Business Journal reports that the garment industry in Mississippi has virtually disappeared in the post-NAFTA era. We gave it away.

This decline in American manufacturing has meant a declining standard of living, not just for the affected workers and their families but for their communities and their States.

Workers have been forced out of higher wage, industrial jobs into low-paying service jobs. In 1980, private-sector service employment constituted 65 percent of the American private sector workforce; by the year 2000, the percentage had soared to 77 percent.

Service jobs are notoriously low-skill, low-paying jobs that offer limited opportunities for advancement because there are relatively few management positions. Look at South Carolina, a State that is near the top of the job creation list in the 1990s but it ranks 35th in average wages—$25,493. A study of a 5-year period, 1992 to 1997, in that State indicated the creation of 94,572 service jobs, a 40.6-percent increase in a sector that pays lower than the statewide average. The higher paying manufacturing sector, the traditional mainstay of South Carolina's economy, lost nearly 1,000 jobs during the 5-year period. In 1997, the State's service employees earned an average $22,693, compared to the average of $29,820 for employees in the State's manufacturing jobs. Economists in the State of South Carolina point out that even with the growth in the service industries, South Carolina's per capita income is among the Nation's lowest.

Unfortunately, the holders of these service jobs are often thought to be students looking for summer work, or marginal workers seeking spending money, or people simply in need of a quick stopover job while on their way to a better paying career. In other words, service jobs are presented as great jobs for people who do not really need them, in many instances. The truth is, people do need these jobs, and many of the holders of these jobs are adults who depend on that paycheck to pay rent or child care. Many are former industrial workers simply trying to exist in the new economy.

Studies of counties in Colorado, Missouri, and Mississippi found a declining standard of living for workers and their communities as they moved from manufacturing jobs to service jobs.

Martha Burt of the Urban Institute found that the growth of homelessness in the United States in the 1980s was not, as commonly supposed, the result of drug addiction, or the deinstitutionalization of the mentally ill, nor the cutbacks in social programs during the Reagan administration, but the shift from an industrial economy to a service economy. With the decline in manufacturing jobs in the 1970s, she explains, huge numbers of former full-time factory workers earning union wages were replaced with part-time workers in retail stores, restaurants, and other service jobs, where wages are too low to enable them to afford the price of housing.

The facts are, as the Stearns Trustee Professor of Political Economy at Northeastern University, Barry Bluestone, emphasizes, even workers who retain manufacturing jobs also face a bleak future, a future of a declining standard of living, if we do not revise our trade polices and insist upon effective labor and environmental standards in our trade agreements. This is because competition from countries which lack, or do not enforce, labor and environmental standards, continues to have a large, negative impact on employment in key sectors of our economy, and on American wages and living standards across the board.

With the rise of international competition and the shift to lower wage service jobs in the United States, real wages have stagnated, making life much more difficult for all American workers. Real average weekly earnings peaked in 1972 at $315.44. Today, even with some recovery in real wages due to the rapid growth in the economy in the 1990s, the average weekly wage is nearly 12 percent less than at its peak.

This decline in real wages is forcing American workers to work longer hours than ever before in order to maintain their living standards. They are running in place—sweating on a treadmill operated by the hyper zealots of free trade regardless of consequences. In fact, the United States is the only major developed country that has experienced an increase in the average workweek and the average work year. Since 1982, the average workweek among prime-age workers in the United States has increased from 39.6 hours to 41.3 in 2000.

This means that the average work year has increased from around 1,840 hours to over 2,020. Put simply, stagnating wages are forcing Americans to work longer and longer hours just to maintain their standard of living. They are not getting ahead. They are simply maintaining what they have worked so hard for, if, indeed, they are even maintaining that.

This is why the Congress must protect and exercise its right to amend trade agreements. Why do we give away Congress' power to amend trade agreements?

We must insist on establishing universal labor and environmental standards. We must insist on protecting American industries from even more devastation by unfair competition from firms operating abroad, exploiting cheap labor pools, and tolerating working conditions which are unacceptably harsh, and environmental standards which are nonexistent.

These essential universal labor and environmental standards can be extracted only through our trade agreements.

In the 1930s, the United States instituted a range of laws and regulations to protect workers and the environment. We did this at the Federal level so that individual States could not take unfair advantage of other States by lowering their minimum wages, permitting child and prison labor, ignoring occupational and safety provisions, eliminating or reducing unemployment benefits, or disregarding environmental standards. We leveled the playing field domestically. No one could manipulate for advantage.

Now we must level the playing field in international competition, where American workers are too often forced to play by the rules in a rigged game. In our new, globalized economy, we run the risk of undermining our own hard won labor and environmental standards if other countries choose to have none of their own or refuse to enforce reasonable requirements. Congress, which has the constitutional power, and therefore the duty "to regulate commerce with foreign nations," must have the means to insist on reasonable labor and environmental standards as part of any and all trade agreements. This is to the benefit not only of American workers, but also of workers, both children and adults, who are laboring under oppressive, unsafe, and unhealthy conditions in other lands.

Over the years, I have seen administrations—Republican and Democratic—repeatedly negotiate trade agreements that reflected priorities other than those of the American people. I say that with a background of 50 years in Congress, the House of Representatives and the Senate, so let me say it again. I have seen administrations—Republican and Democratic—repeatedly negotiate trade agreements that reflected priorities other than those of the American people. I have seen this Nation genuflect at the altar of big business interests. I have witnessed the holy battle cry of "free trade" become a club by which to beat into submission any voice that expressed an argument for balance and fairness. That is understandably the outcome of trade talks that ignore the constitutional role of the Congress in international commerce.

While it is not surprising that Republican and Democratic administrations would attempt to enter into trade agreements that reflect their own priorities, it is absolutely distressing—it is extremely puzzling to this Senator—that the Members of Congress would willingly give up their right to shape trade agreements that reflect the priorities of the American people, and the best interests of the United States. It just demonstrates how cowed and how intimidating we in public life have become by the absolute terror of bumper sticker politics. Free trade is the battle cry. Don't complicate it with real world concerns.

As a U.S. Senator from West Virginia, I am always—first, last, and all the time—for the protection of the interests of this country, of this Nation's workers, and this country's manufacturing industries and I am going to continue being that way by opposing the granting of blanket fast track authority for this or any other President.

Call it trade promotion authority, if you will—it is still fast track—to give away American interests when it comes to trade.

I yield the floor.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent the order for the quorum call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CARPER). Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

NOMINATION OF PAUL G. CASSELL, OF UTAH, TO BE UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE FOR THE DISTRICT OF UTAH

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now go into executive session and proceed to the consideration of Executive Calendar No. 815, which the clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Paul G. Cassell, of Utah, to be United States District Judge for the District of Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the time until 6 p.m. will be for debate on the nomination, equally divided between the chairman and ranking member of the Judiciary Committee or their designees.

Who yields time?

The Senator from Vermont.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 minute.

I know Professor Cassell is a friend of the distinguished senior Senator from Utah, who has urged his confirmation. I do not know whether, as a courtesy, the senior Senator wanted to go first.

Mr. HATCH. Whatever the distinguished chairman prefers.

I thank the chairman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I rise to voice my strong support for Professor Paul G. Cassell, who is President Bush's nominee to the District Court for the District of Utah.

This nomination is very important to my home State of Utah. In fact, the chief judge of the Federal District Court in Utah is sitting in the audience. This is so important for them, for everyone in Utah, and to me personally. I would like to take a few minutes to introduce this exemplary lawyer to the Senate, and to explain why Professor Cassell is one of the most qualified people ever nominated to the district court bench.

Listen to the highlights of Professor Cassell's résumé: He graduated from Stanford Law School, where he was president of the Stanford Law Review and a member of the Order of the Coif—the highest honors you can have in law school. He served as a law clerk to then-Judge Antonin Scalia on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, and to Chief Justice Warren E. Burger of the U.S. Supreme Court. He then went to the Justice Department, where he served as an Associate Deputy Attorney General, handling a variety of complex legal issues—including the efforts to defend the constitutionality of the United States Sentencing Guidelines, passed by Congress to regulate unwarranted sentencing disparity. Next, he worked as an assistant U.S. attorney in the Eastern District of Virginia. In that position, Cassell tried more than a dozen jury trials in felony criminal cases, obtaining guilty verdicts in every case that reached the jury.

I would like to highlight a couple of cases he tried there. Cassell successfully prosecuted the CEO of a failed savings and loan for theft of $500,000; two investors and a real estate agent who had defrauded a HUD program; a drug dealer who was smuggling guns and a federally licensed firearms dealer who had aided him in this effort; and the notorious "yellow glove" bank robber, who had perpetrated a string of armed robberies in Virginia and Maryland. He also successfully prosecuted the largest seizure of crack cocaine in the history of National Airport at that time. For his efforts in cases such as these, Cassell was recognized by the Attorney General with a Special Achievement Award.

Professor Cassell's impressive résumé and his experience in court are no doubt the reason why a substantial majority of the ABA review committee rates Professor Cassell "well qualified" to be a federal judge. it is also the reason why a number of people who know Professor Cassell's work and character have written to me in support of his nomination.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have a selection of such letters printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Exhibit 1.)

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I apologize for my laryngitis. I have had it for about 2 weeks.

Professor Cassell's educational achievements, Department of Justice experience, and successes in trial are just a warm-up, in my opinion, for an even more important chapter of his career. In 1992, Cassell and his wife, Trish, returned to the West after he accepted a teaching position at the University of Utah College of Law. It was there that he unleashed his intellect and tremendous work ethic for the benefit of his students, the faculty, the citizens of Utah, and the Nation's victims of crime.

Professor Cassell quickly became one of the students' favorite teachers. He has always prepared well for his classes, he uses relevant real-world examples from his career as a prosecutor, and he teaches with an approachable demeanor—and even a sense of humor. These are some of the qualities that led, in 1997, to Professor Cassell's being one of the youngest law professors ever to receive the Faculty Achievement Award for Teaching Excellence—the "teacher of the year" award. Three years later in 2000, Cassell became one of the youngest chaired faculty members at the University of Utah when he was awarded the James I. Farr Professorship of Law.

As a scholar, Professor Cassell has become a national expert on criminal procedure and evidence. His scholarship includes over 25 law review articles, which have been published in such prestigious journals as the Stanford Law Review, the Michigan Law Review, the UCLA Law Review, the Brigham Young University Law Review, and the Utah Law Review. He has also made presentations at law schools around the country, including Harvard, Stanford, Berkeley, Michigan, Northwestern, and UCLA. He has shared his knowledge and expertise with Congress, testifying numerous times before congressional committees on issues pertaining to criminal justice, including testimony on victims' rights, capital punishment, Miranda, and criminal cases in the United States Supreme Court.

Unlike many scholars, however, Professor Cassell has also put his intellect to practical use in his community. For example, Professor Cassell has been actively involved in fighting domestic violence and sexual assault in Utah. He has served as the chair of the Legislative Committee of the Utah Council on Victims of Crime as well as a member on the Utah Supreme Court's Advisory Committee on Rules of Criminal Procedure.

Professor Cassell has donated an extraordinary amount of time advocating on behalf of his fellow Utahns in court. In fact, he has done as much or more pro bono legal work as anyone I can remember ever appearing before the Judiciary Committee. He has represented dozens and dozens of crime victims, all without charge.

Let me give just one example—a case that came to my attention because of the moving letter I received from the victim's mother. It is the case called State v. Casey, in which Cassell argued on behalf of a 12-year-old Utah boy who had been victimized by sexual assault. When the boy was denied his right to speak in opposition to a plea bargain reducing the charge from a first-degree aggravated felony to a misdemeanor, Cassell had the case certified to the Utah Supreme Court as one involving an issue of "exceptional importance" and argued the issue on the boy's behalf. The boy's mother wrote me a letter about Cassell's work in that case, saying that Cassell:

> . . . was the first attorney who listened to us with interest and understanding.

She explained that:

> Paul worked long and late hours on our case . . . at no financial gain for himself.

Because of Cassell's work, she said her family:

> . . . can now start to move forward with our lives, putting the tragic past behind us.

It is not only Utahns who can say such things about Paul Cassell, because in addition to his work in our home State, Cassell has worked free of charge on behalf of crime victims all across the country. For example, in 1996, Cassell undertook to represent 89 victims of the Oklahoma City bombing. They had been ordered not to watch court proceedings in the case if they were going to provide so-called impact testimony at the death-penalty phase of Timothy McVeigh's trail. This order appeared to contravene the requirements of the victims bill of rights, a Federal statute passed by Congress to guarantee crime victims the right to attend court proceedings. Cassell appealed to the tenth circuit, which rejected the petition on the grounds that crime victims lacked standing to present their claims to a appellate court. Cassell's petition for rehearing in the case was supported by 49 Members of Congress—of both political parties—as well as the United States Department of Justice, all six State Attorneys General in the tenth circuit, and some of the leading crime victims' groups in the country, such as Mothers Against Drunk Driving and the National Crime Victims Constitutional Amendment Network. When the petition for rehearing was denied, Cassell helped crime victims come to Congress to obtain remedial legislation. Congress passed the Victims' Rights Clarification Act of 1997 by a margin of 418 to 19 in the House and unanimously here in the Senate. That would not have happened but for Professor Cassell. When President Clinton signed the act into law, he endorsed Cassell's position, explaining "when someone is a victim, he or she should be at the center of the criminal justice process, not on the outside looking in."

Again, all of that work was done by Professor Cassell without any compensation. Those victims would not have has any voice at all in the criminal justice system if it weren't for the selfless sacrifice and dedication of Professor Cassell.

In sum, Mr. President, Professor Cassell's record demonstrates everything that this body should hope for in a judicial nominee: unquestioned competence; a track record of hard work; a personal dedication to justice; and a commitment to public service. To that, I would like to add my personal opinion. I know Paul Cassell, and I know him to be not only an extraordinary lawyer and an extraordinary scholar, but also one of the most decent, honest, honorable, and fairminded people I have ever know. He is going to be an absolutely great judge, and an excellent addition to the Utah District Court bench. I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of his confirmation.

I thank the Chair and reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, OFFICE OF JUSTICE PROGRAMS, VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN OFFICE,
Washington, DC, March 18, 2002.

Hon. PATRICK J. LEAHY,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN LEAHY: I am writing to express my strong personal support for the appointment of Professor Paul Cassell to the Federal District Court of Utah. I believe, based on my pass association with Professor Cassell, that he will make an excellent judge.

Professor Cassell and I have worked together for over five years as co-members of the Utah Council on Victims of Crime and I have come to respect his integrity, great knowledge of the law, and ability to assist others in the comprehension of the often complex issues at hand. Often in my work as State Coordinator for the Utah Governor's Cabinet Council on Domestic Violence, Professor Cassell was of invaluable assistance in analyzing legislation as it was being proposed and many times provided an expert opinion on existing federal and state statutes. Issues of confidentiality, victim notification and courtroom video taping became more understandable as he worked to provide a solid, legal foundation for others to follow.

It is my belief that Professor Cassell is exactly the right kind of balanced individual that will make him an exceptional Federal District Court Judge.

Respectfully,

DIANE M. STUART,
Director.

STATE OF UTAH,
OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Salt Lake City, UT, September 27, 2001.

Re judicial nominee Professor Paul G. Cassell.

Hon. ORRIN HATCH,
U.S. Senate, Senate Russell Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR HATCH: I am writing to you in your capacity as ranking member of the Senate Judiciary Committee to express my strong support for the nomination of Professor Paul G. Cassell to the United States District Court for the District of Utah. He is an active practitioner, prolific scholar, and fervent advocate for victims' rights.

Professor Cassell is not "anti-defendant" as some have charged, but pro-victim. As a national leader of the victims' rights movement, Professor Cassell was instrumental in achieving reforms in Utah law that have given voice to victims of crime. Professor Cassell has exposed shoddy scholarship attacking capital punishment and advocated for moderating Miranda's sweeping exclusionary rule. However well supported and reasonable, these positions have understandably not won him points in the defense community. But in the larger community, Paul Cassell is highly regarded for his service in the public interest.

In addition, I personally know Paul Cassell to be a man of absolute integrity and fairness. He personifies the principal of "justice." He has the ability to put personal opinion and bias, and fairly and impartially adjudicate the issues brought before him.

In sum, Professor Cassell is well respected in Utah and would be a credit to the federal bench in this State. I urge you to support his nomination.

Very truly yours,

MARK L. SHURTLEFF,
Attorney General.

MARCH 18, 2002.

Hon. ORRIN HATCH,
Ranking Member, Committee on the Judiciary, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SIR: I am writing this letter to you today to express my deep support for the nomination of Paul Cassell to a position as a Federal Judge.

I have had the pleasure of working with Mr. Cassell over a long period of time on a very important case involving my family and our rights as victims. During that time I had many conversations with Paul and I felt that I came to know him reasonably well as both a person and an attorney.

As an attorney, Paul's accomplishments are many, and I am sure that you have already been made aware of the many great experiences and achievements of his distinguished career. I wish to speak more intimately of my personal experience with Mr. Cassell's handling of our own case.

Our case was probably the most difficult and emotionally draining experience of our lives. My family was forced to deal with a tragedy that we never imagined would happen to us. We were confronted with many obstacles that we never anticipated and we grew increasingly frustrated with the confusion, and seeming contradictions of the Justice System as we were lied to, and mislead, by many different people throughout the process, including people that we thought were supposed to be on our side.

During the height of our frustration with the handling of our case we began to search for someone to provide us with legal help and representation and we were fortunate enough to find Mr. Cassell. Paul agreed to help us without ever charging us a penny as he tirelessly worked to resolve our case in a favorable and just way. He was always honest and upfront with us about our case, even when the answer was not what we wanted to hear. Paul had a gift for being able to wade through all the legal confusion and explain things clearly and understandably to us. Paul impressed me as a person who is able to see things fairly from all different perspectives and help opposing sides find the right solution to a problem. Our case did not end with exactly the decision that we hoped for, but thanks to Paul Cassell we were able to find some measure of justice and closure, and we feel much better about the outcome of our case. It is my firm belief that you would be very hard pressed to find any better attorney than Mr. Cassell!

As a person, Paul is a very honest, fairminded, and compassionate man. In today's world it has become increasingly hard to find people whose judgement you can completely trust and rely upon, but Paul Cassell is just such a person. At a time when more and more people are becoming jaded about the law and losing confidence in our Justice System, Paul Cassell is the right type of person to help bring integrity back into the legal profession and restore the faith of the American people in their courts, both victims and defendants.

I hope I never again find myself or my family in the position of having to deal with our legal system in such a personal way. But if I do, I hope that the Judge who hears our case and the attorney's on both sides of the issue are people like Paul Cassell, because if they are then I know we'll be in the best possible hands.

I sincerely hope that you will support Paul Cassell's nomination as a Federal Judge. Please don't reject him over something so trivial as political party affiliation or ideology. Accept him because he's a very good person who truly has Americans best interests at heart. Now, more than ever, America desperately needs great leaders, like Paul Cassell, and I know that you will not find a better candidate for the job!!!

Thank you for your careful consideration,

STERLING JAMES POLL.

MARCH 18, 2002.

Hon. ORRIN HATCH,
Ranking Member, Committee on the Judiciary, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SIR: I am writing you today to make you aware of why I feel Paul Cassell would make an excellent choice for a Judge.

Life brought circumstances to my family and I that we had never imagined we would have to deal with. We found ourselves thrust into the U.S. legal system. We were totally unprepared for this. We found the legal system to be confusing, contradictory and unsympathetic. We were in great need of help. Help to get us through, help to understand, and help to find justice. We began calling attorneys on the phone in search of the information that we needed. Many phone calls later, we did find someone who recommended Paul Cassell.

We called Paul Cassell, and he was the first attorney who listened to us with interested and understanding. He advised us with no hesitation, and immediately said he would take our case—Pro-Bono. We then began our relationship with Paul.

Paul worked long and late hours on our case. We found him to be honest and forthright about what was going on with our case. He explained in plain terms what exactly would happen at our hearings. He made us aware of all possibilities, from both perspectives of the case. He saw our case through to the Utah Supreme Court.

Our case did not have the results that we had hoped for, however, we are a family, now have some closure to a very tragic situation. We all feel that due to the work Paul Cassell did for us, at no financial gain for himself, we did everything that could possibly have been done to get the justice we feel we deserved. We can not start to move forward with our lives, putting the tragic past behind us. In particular, my fourteen-year-old son, is now starting to make progress and feel good about himself. He knows that he has helped to make the pathway a little easier for other people in the same situation.

I feel that Paul has all the qualities a judge for our country should have. He is honest, forthright, concerned about whether or not justice has been served. We spent time with him, had many conversations with him, where we came to a clear understanding of how much he cares for the people of our country. We could see how important the justice system is to him. There are not many attorneys that would take on a case Probono, where he is going to have to spend many hours of his own personal time, just to help people in need.

I recommend Paul Cassell highly, for a judgeship. If you are interested in what is going to be best for the people of our country, I truly feel that you are not going to find any better man for the job.

Thank you for your time and consideration,

CYNTHIA F. CASEY.

DEAR SENATOR HATCH: On behalf of the National Organization of Parents Of Murdered Children, Inc., and its over 100,000 members, I am writing to strongly support Paul Cassell's confirmation for the Federal District Court for the District of Utah. Hon. ORRIN HATCH,
Ranking Member, Committee on the Judiciary, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR HATCH: I am writing to express my strong support for the confirmation of Prof. Paul Cassell's nomination to the United States District Court for the District of Utah.

I have known Prof. Cassell through our work together in the cause of establishing and enforcing rights for crime victims. Paul is a person of compassion and fairness. He has deep respect for the rule of law and for the role of the judiciary in preserving and protecting it. He is at all times respectful of others and displays a temperament that will always remain faithful to the obligations of a federal judge. He has a strong work ethic and will clearly be able to meet the rigors of a busy trial court.

Paul is a person of intellectual and moral integrity; he will serve with distinction on the District Court when he is confirmed, giving equal justice to all who appear before him. I urge you and all of your colleagues to confirm the nomination of Prof. Paul Cassell.

Thank you for considering these views.

Sincerely,

STEVE TWIST,
Assistant General Counsel, Viad Corp; Chief Counsel, National Victims Constitutional, Amendment Network.

RUTGERS UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF LAW,

Hon. PATRICK J. LEAHY,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

Hon. ORRIN HATCH,
Ranking Member, Committee on the Judiciary, Dirksen Senate Office building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATORS LEAHY AND HATCH: I write to support enthusiastically and without reservation the nomination of Professor Paul G. Cassell to be a federal district judge. I have known Paul for many years, and I believe he will make a highly capable judge. I wrote a letter supporting his tenure at the University of Utah College of Law several years ago, and he has continued to shine as a legal thinker and writer.

Professor Cassell is intelligent, thoughtful, and willing to explore different approaches to problems that arise in the law. He writes extremely well and is top flight in his analysis of cases and doctrines. Indeed, he has on occasion pointed out an analytical flaw in a doctrinal argument I was making, thus allowing me to reshape the argument before publishing it. Professor Cassell has continued the tradition of Justice John Harlan and Professor Grano by holding the premises of Miranda v. Arizona up to the light and asking why the Constitution should consider police interrogation such a threat to autonomy and free will.

We have "dueled" in a friendly way in print (Volume 43 of the UCLA Law Review, pages 821–959), before a TV camera (in the PBS Debates-Debates series), before the Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Oversight, and at the University of Michigan symposium on Miranda and Dickerson (November, 2000).

Professor Cassell and I disagree on some issues and yet respect each other. This fact alone says volumes, I think, about how effective he will be as a judge in dealing with lawyers and others in his courtroom. I predict that Paul Cassell will research the law energetically, understand it as well as anyone can, and apply it fairly and consistently.

Should you wish further details, please let me know.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE C. THOMAS III,
Professor of Law, Judge Alexander P. Waugh, Sr. Distinguished Scholar.

GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY LAW CENTER,

Re judicial nominee Paul Cassell (U.S. District Court, District of Utah).

Senator PATRICK LEAHY,
Russell Senate Office Building, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

Senator ORRIN HATCH,
Hart Office Building, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR LEAHY AND SENATOR HATCH: I understand that my colleague in teaching, Professor Paul Cassell of the University of Utah Law School, has been nominated by President George W. Bush to serve as a United States District Judge for the District of Utah. I know Paul very well, and I recommend him enthusiastically. (I write in my personal capacity as a professor of civil rights law at Georgetown University Law Center for the past twenty-seven years. I have previously been privileged to contribute to the work of the Senate Judiciary Committee by consulting with or advising Senators from both parties, including Senator Joseph Biden of Delaware regarding judicial nominations, Senator Orrin Hatch of Utah concerning technical perfections to a civil rights act, and Senator Charles McC. Mathias of Maryland concerning substantive provisions of several proposed bills expanding civil rights. I write this letter at my own initiative after seeing Professor Cassell by chance last week and learning of his then-pending hearing. I am sending a courtesy copy of this letter to my former colleague Professor Viet Dinh, now Assistant Attorney General.)

I have known Paul Cassell for over twelve years. I met him after he married one of my former students, Georgetown University Law Center graduate Patricia Cassell. Because he and I are both interested in constitutional law and civil rights, I have followed his academic work for many years, including his writing concerning the Miranda case and other related issues in criminal law. Although Paul's academic work has engendered some political criticism because it challenges a hallmark case from the Warren era, it is wholly and completely within the mainstream of American academic discourse. Paul's arguments have been challenging, well-reasoned, and broadly judicious in their criticism of the established order. His writings have not been narrowly focused on political considerations but have considered what works best for society and the legal order (such as whether Miranda actually protects society's victims), in the best tradition of American legal scholarship. It is true that Paul's work calls for the disestablishment of a court-declared "constitutional right," but the same was true of attacks on The Dred Scott Case, which recognized a constitutional right to hold slaves, and Lochner v. New York, which recognized a right to be free of government regulation of the employment contracts of workers. I disagree with some positions Paul has taken, including his distrust of the Miranda decision itself, but disagreement with the courts' declarations of "rights" is a part of the job of every American law professor, and Paul has handled his part of that discussion with rectitude and complete fidelity to our academic tradition and to the rule of law.

I also respect Paul quite highly because, though he fits within the broad academic mainstream, he has shown independence and has resisted pressure to conform for conformity's sake, especially regarding currently prevailing majority positions that strongly favor the criminal-law decisions of the 1960's. In my view this shows an independent mind that is very desirable in a federal judge, especially one sitting at the district level where conformist local pressure may often make it difficult to rule on contentious subjects. Yet even with his independent thinking, Paul's emphasis in public discussions has also been marked by a desire to bring balance to the public debate, such as by recognizing the interests of victims of crime as well as defendants charged with crimes. The ability to see countervailing values, and to listen to them, is a valuable asset for any judge, especially a federal judge sitting with life tenure. In all my dealings with Paul, airing many difficult issues of public policy, I have never heard him raise his voice or denigrate the personal commitment or integrity of an opponent. His personality and temperament are ideal for a federal district judge.

I have been privileged to attend an academic workshop with Paul and to meet his family and children on several occasions, and even skied with him and his family on one occasion when my family vacationed in Utah. He is a wonderfully kind and generous person, completely unpretentious and unaffected despite his high standing in his community and his nationwide renown in academia. He commands strong respect from his colleagues at the University of Utah and elsewhere. He leads a balanced life that includes much pro bono work for the public interest and other community activities. Far from being an ideologue or a single-issue activist, Paul is a multi-dimensional person with solid American values and an admirable commitment to making life better for all Americans.

Finally, I realize that there has been some criticism of Paul for his critical views on the Miranda case, especially his representation of the Fourth Circuit and Congress in a Supreme Court case challenging the Miranda rule. But Paul's role in that case showed his usual fidelity to the rule of law, not a challenge to it. In all my years of knowing Paul, I have never seen an indication that he would try to subvert the system to achieve his goals; his work has always been entirely open and direct, using the traditional methods of persuasion and openness that characterize both honest professors and honest judges. Most pertinently for potential future trial-court judges, I have complete confidence that Paul would never intentionally mis-find facts to protect his rulings from the bench or otherwise manipulate the process to accomplish personal goals. My narrow disagreement with Paul on Miranda does not alter one essential point: if my rights were at stake, or the rights of any of my traditional civil-rights clients when I practiced many years ago, I would affirmatively want Paul Cassell to judge the facts and the law of my case. his confirmation and appointment could do nothing but strengthen my trust in the American judiciary.

With much respect and admiration, I remain

Yours truly,

CHARLES F. ABERNATHY.

NORTHWESTERN SCHOOL OF LAW

Hon. ORRIN HATCH,
Ranking Member, Committee on the Judiciary, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR HATCH: I write to voice my support for the appointment of Professor Paul Cassell to the Federal District Court of Utah. Professor Cassell and I have worked together on many legal matters involving the rights of crime victims, particularly sexual assault and domestic violence victims. He is extraordinarily intelligent and a tireless advocate who through his down-to-earth style can distill complex legal theories into simple and persuasive arguments.

As a Democrat and a feminist, I may not always agree with professor Cassell. However, as an academic activist with a specialty in violence against women issues, I am unaware of a single instance where professor Cassell and myself disagreed on the legal issues or strategy involved in our many collaborations. As the Director of the Crime Victim Appellate Clinic and the founder of its Violence Against Women Project, I have had the privilege to collaborate with Professor Cassell on a variety of violence against women cases. I can say without hesitation that Professor Cassell is one of the preeminent leaders in safeguarding the rights of sexual assault and domestic violence survivors in the criminal justice system.

During our two years of working together, Professor Cassell and my organization, the National Crime Victim Law Institute (NVCLI), have represented many survivors of sexual assault and domestic violence. For example, just last year in Hagen v. Massachusetts, No. SJC-08627 (Mass. 2001), we helped file an amicus brief on behalf of Jane Doe, Inc., Massachusetts Coalition Against Sexual Assault and the National Alliance of Sexual Assault Coalitions, defending a rape victim's right to have the convicted rapist begin serving his sentence thirteen years after the sentence was imposed. The issue is currently pending before the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court.

In Cronan v. Cronan, 774 A.2d 866 (R.I. 2001), representing a battered woman with the support of the Rhode Island Coalition Against Domestic Violence and the National Alliance of Sexual Assault Coalitions, Professor Cassell and the NCVLI successfully argued that a battered woman had properly initiated criminal charges against her husband.

Just two weeks ago, in State v. Gomez (Utah Supreme Court March 4, 2002), Professor Cassell and the NCVLI filed a brief on behalf of the Rape Recovery Center (the largest rape crisis center in Utah) with the support of the National Alliance to End Sexual Violence defending the privilege for confidential communications to rape crisis counselors.

Just last week, in State v. Blake (Utah Supreme Court March 14, 2002), Professor Cassell filed a brief on behalf of the Rape Recovery Center with the support of the National Alliance to End Sexual Violence defending the right of a rape victim to keep confidential communications made to a mental health therapist.

Notwithstanding our areas of disagreement, I believe that Professor Cassell has the temperament, integrity and commitment to follow the letter and spirit of established law that will make him an exceptional Federal District Court Judge.

Respectfully,

GINA S. MCCLARD,
Clinical Professor of Law, Lewis & Clark Law School, Associate Director, National Crime Victim Law Institute.

Hon. ORRIN HATCH,
Ranking Member, Committee on the Judiciary, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR HATCH: I write to voice my support for the appointment of Professor Paul Cassell to the Federal District Court of Utah. Professor Cassell and I have had occasion to work together on several legal matters involving the rights of crime victims. He is an exceedingly bright and thoughtful advocate with a superior ability to synthesize complex ideas into a simple and persuasive argument.

Professor Cassell has a keen understanding of the limits of law while fiercely defending the unique role law plays in promoting civility. This is a particularly appropriate characteristic for any judicial nominee.

As an academic activist with a focus on women's rights, I do not always agree with Professor Cassell but he has frequently provided pro bono legal services to rape crisis centers, domestic violence advocates, and other victims' organizations who are advancing the cause of justice for women. For example, Professor Cassell and I recently worked together to file briefs protecting the confidentiality of rape crisis counseling records in Utah.

Notwithstanding areas of disagreement, I value Professor Cassell's integrity, his willingness to debate openly and his commitment to the idea that the law works best with many diverse voices at the decision-making table.

Sincerely,

Mary Joe Frug Visiting, Assistant Professor of Law.

Re nomination of Professor Paul Cassell.

Hon. Patrick J. Leahy,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

Hon. Orrin Hatch,
Ranking Member, Committee on the Judiciary, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

Dear Senators Leahy and Hatch: I am writing on behalf of Professor Paul G. Cassell to support his nomination to the United States District Court for the District of Utah. I have known Professor Cassell for more than 17 years, both as a close personal friend and a professional colleague. He is without peer in either category.

I came to know Professor Cassell professionally in 1984 when we clerked at the same time for the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. From the beginning, Paul distinguished himself as a brilliant writer, a thoughtful legal scholar, and a decent and honorable person.

Subsequently, I worked with Paul at the United States Attorneys Office for the Eastern District of Virginia. There I had the privilege of trying my first federal criminal jury trial as a federal prosecutor with Paul serving as lead counsel. Later I enjoyed the even greater privilege of serving as the best man at Paul's wedding. Although in recent years our families have seen less of each other since his move to Utah, we remain in close contact and my family had the pleasure of hosting Paul, his wife Trish, and their three daughters during his recent trip to Washington for the confirmation hearing.

Based on this lengthy personal and professional relationship, I can say without hesitation or reservation that Paul would be a tremendous asset to the federal bench. Paul would bring to the bench an incisive legal mind as well as a fundamental decency and respect for all who appear before him, without regard to their status as plaintiff or defendant, lawyer or client, accused or accuser. In my conversations with Paul since his nomination, he has emphasized how proud he is to have been honored by this nomination and how committed he is to serve with honor and distinction. Given that Paul's intellectual prowess is exceeded only perhaps by his humility and decency, I have no doubt that given the opportunity he will so serve.

In observing Paul's confirmation hearing, it was clear that many of the questions focused on his ability and willingness to accept and consider different points of view and to put aside his views as an advocate and follow the laws as a Judge. In that regard, I would make the following observations: I am a lifelong Democrat and since leaving the United States Attorneys Office I have worked as a criminal defense counsel. I regularly appear before district judges throughout the country on behalf of those accused with a wide variety of offenses. Although I routinely find myself in disagreement with Paul on numerous legal issues including the death penalty (which I oppose) and Miranda (which I support), I have no doubt that we in the defense bar and our clients, would receive fair and even-handed treatment in Paul's courtroom. For although Paul undoubtedly views my beliefs with the same skepticism as I view his, he is unfailingly receptive to my differing views, courteous in addressing our differences, and respectful of my positions. Indeed, he accords respect to everyone that crosses his path, lacks even a touch of arrogance or conceit and is unfailingly polite even in situations where something less might be appropriate. I do not worry that as a judge, Paul might be high-handed, discourteous or have any difficulty following the principles of stare decisis. Given his decency and abiding integrity, I do not think it is in Paul's nature to act other than honorably and courteously.

I hope that the foregoing is of assistance in your consideration of Professor Cassell's nomination to the bench. If I can provide further information or answer any questions, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Sincerely,

Mark J. Hulkower.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

The Senator from Vermont.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, how much time is available to the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Vermont?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah has 3 minutes 43 seconds. The Senator from Vermont has 12 minutes 40 seconds.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, with last week's votes, the number of Federal judges confirmed since the change in Senate majority 10 months ago now totals 56. Under Democratic leadership, the Senate has confirmed more judges in 10 months than were confirmed by the Republican-controlled Senate in the 1996 and 1997 sessions combined.

Today's vote is on the nomination of Paul Cassell to the United States District Court for the District of Utah. After a great deal of thought, I will not be voting for this nominee today. Although this nomination is supported by my good friend from Utah, Senator HATCH, we disagree on his suitability to serve as a Federal judge. Senator HATCH has been an admirable and stalwart advocate for this nomination, and I certainly mean him no disrespect in voting against Professor Cassell.

The constitutional responsibility to advise and consent to the President's selection of lifetime tenured judicial nominees should not be devalued to advise and rubber stamp. When the President sends us a nominee whose qualifications, judgment or background raise concerns or who has a misunderstanding of the appropriate role of a Federal judge, I intend to make my concerns known. This is one of those times. The nomination of Professor Paul Cassell raises several areas of serious concern to me.

I think it is important to note that we have not engaged in a game of tit for tat for past Republican practices, nor have we delayed proceedings on this nomination, as so many nominations were delayed in past years of Republican control of the Senate. Instead, the Committee has seriously considered the nomination and worked hard to complete the Committee's record of information about this nominee. We have given the nominee an opportunity to be heard, promptly scheduled a Committee vote, and reported this nomination to the floor, although not unanimously. This is far more fairness, courtesy and orderly process than was provided so many nominees during prior years. Professor Cassell, in his nomination to the District Court, has been given a fair hearing and a fair process before the Committee and the Senate.

I am proud of the work the Judiciary Committee has done since the change in the majority. I am proud of the way we have considered nominees fairly and expeditiously and the way we have been able to report to the Senate so many qualified, nonideological, consensus nominees. We also have held hearings for a number of controversial nominees, such as Professor Cassell. Controversial nominations take more time and effort, but we are making that effort and taking that time to be fair and thorough in our consideration of those nominations, as well. One measure of our fairness is the fact that we are proceeding even on controversial nominations such as this one.

After thoroughly considering the record of this nominee, chosen for lifetime appointment by President Bush, I find that I cannot in good conscience vote in favor of Professor Cassell's confirmation. I have voted in favor of 56 other Bush judicial nominees, many of whom had been involved in partisan politics or ideological groups. I also voted in favor of the last person confirmed to the District Court in Utah, Judge Ted Stewart, a controversial nominee, and I did so even in the immediate aftermath of the Republicans' unprecedented party-line vote against Justice Ronnie White of Missouri, because I made a commitment to Senator HATCH.

At Senator HATCH's request, the Senate Judiciary Committee gave Professor Cassell a hearing on his nomination in March and the Committee voted on his nomination in the beginning of May. That is fairer treatment than more than 50 of President Clinton's judicial nominees ever got, those who never got a hearing and never got a vote by the Committee when the Republicans were in charge. Many others waited for months or years for a vote on their nominations. Our Judiciary Committee, however, accorded Professor Cassell a hearing although his nomination is quite controversial and even though he received a partial "not qualified" rating from the ABA.

Professor Cassell is a highly intelligent man, with an admirable passion for teaching and advocacy. But his written work, the record established at our hearing, and the answers he submitted to written questions raise grave doubts about his intellectual forthrightness and his capacity and willingness to put aside the extreme views he has long held. A judge who lacks the open-minded ability to hear both sides of a case cannot be depended on to administer justice impartially. I am concerned that he will be unable to set aside his personal views and that he has, in his work on legal issues, shown a strong tendency already to be motivated by the outcomes he seeks rather than by the facts.

In 1992, Professor Cassell launched what became an 8-year campaign against Miranda v. Arizona, the Supreme Court's landmark ruling that police must provide certain warnings before questioning a suspect in custody. As part of this campaign, he generated a series of statistical studies to try to show that Miranda harms law enforcement.

At the same time, he filed briefs in Miranda-related cases around the country seeking to convince courts to uphold a 1968 law—18 U.S.C. section 3501—that purported to overrule Miranda and make "voluntariness" the sole test for the admissibility of confessions in Federal criminal cases.

Let me emphasize at the outset that I do not fault Professor Cassell for holding opinions with which I may disagree, or for the zealousness of his advocacy. While most criminal justice experts made their peace with Miranda decades ago, reasonable minds can certainly differ as to the wisdom and practicality of this venerable precedent. What troubles me about the nominee's campaign against Miranda is the manner in which he waged it.

In article after article, Professor Cassell overstated the anti-Miranda position, citing his own flawed empirical studies as evidence that Miranda harms law enforcement.

These one-sided attacks on Miranda drew unusually sharp criticism for their failure to meet standard scholarly norms. Academics who reviewed this nominee's research took him to task for being partisan and ideologically driven while masquerading as an objective scholar. They called his methods unsound, and accused him of manipulating data to reach his preferred result.

Professor Cassell's work on Miranda was not restricted to, or even primarily aimed at, the world of academia. Based on his arguably flawed statistical studies, he made several empirical claims to the Senate Judiciary Committee and to various Federal courts, including the United States Supreme Court. Clearly, this raises the stakes from simple academic discourse. It is one thing to write something in a law review article—you can write whatever you want in a law review article. But it is an entirely different matter to represent something to a congressional committee or to the Supreme Court. A lawyer should have a great deal of confidence in any information that he presents to one of those bodies. At a minimum, it would be unethical for a lawyer to present information that he knew was unreliable. Professor Cassell's use of his own questionable data to try to influence legislators and judges on an issue of profound national importance raises serious questions about his judgment and integrity.

I am also concerned by the partisan spin of Professor Cassell's campaign against Miranda. In his congressional testimony and writings, Professor Cassell was sharply critical of the Clinton Justice Department for avoiding litigation regarding the constitutionality of 18 U.S.C. section 3501. Among other things, he actually suggested the Department had deliberately and repeatedly misled the courts with respect to Miranda, and that its defense of Miranda was driven by politics and not by legal analysis. In a 1997 article entitled "Another Law Janet Reno Doesn't Like," Professor Cassell took specific aim at the former Attorney General, accusing her of "impeding the enforcement" of a statute, and "team[ing] up with defense lawyers to let armed felons and other criminals escape prosecution."

Yet Professor Cassell himself had acknowledged in a 1995 article that prior Republican Administrations had also failed to defend section 3501. Although Republican Attorneys General like John Mitchell and Ed Meese were cognizant of 18 U.S.C. section 3501, Professor Cassell wrote, "no serious efforts were undertaken . . . to secure any determination of the constitutionality of the law." In addition, "[A] recommendation by the Justice Department's Office of Legal Policy in 1987 that an aggressive effort be made to test the law was never adopted as the result of opposition by other agencies within the Department."

At the nomination hearing, I asked Professor Cassell to explain his criticism of Attorney General Reno regarding section 3501 in light of his earlier acknowledgment that prior Attorneys General had taken a similar position. At first he distanced himself from his comments regarding Attorneys General Mitchell and Meese by implying that the magazine in which they appeared had somehow misrepresented his words. He then suggested that because the quote appeared in a popular magazine, the National Journal, it should be given less credence than, say, a law review article.

Recall that I am not referring to a situation in which Professor Cassell was quoted out of context. I am referring to an article that Professor Cassell co-wrote with a colleague. That is why his responses to my oral questions in the hearing seemed so slippery. I gave him another chance to explain his comment in answers to written questions. Finally, Professor Cassell grudgingly acknowledged, "it does not appear that any Administration made aggressive efforts to invoke 3501." In sum, Professor Cassell's record of ultra-zealous, partisan advocacy regarding Miranda raises serious questions about his ability to serve as an unbiased decisionmaker.

Another cause to which Professor Cassell has dedicated himself is the defense of the death penalty. Indeed, he has been called "the academic world's foremost defender of capital punishment." At the hearing on his nomination, in response to questions from Senator DURBIN, Professor Cassell asserted, "my experience with the death penalty is rather limited." This statement confounds reason.

Relying on the list of publications and presentations that Professor Cassell submitted to this committee, I count the following references to capital punishment, dating back to 1987: three substantial articles; four appearances before committees of the U.S. Congress, and one each before the Utah House and Senate; three submissions to popular publications; and three debates. One of those debates took place just 18 months ago: Professor Cassell squared off against Stephen Bright, one of the nation's preeminent defenders of those accused of capital crimes. These examples do not even include the large number of interviews he has given to the press on the topic. He has written and spoken widely on this fundamental matter, but now terms his experience with it "limited."

Despite mounting evidence that our death penalty system is riddled with error and desperately in need of reform, Professor Cassell has doggedly maintained that there is no more accurate sanction in the world than capital punishment as it is practiced in the United States, and that the chance of an innocent being put to death is an "urban legend." He supports this position by asserting that there is no definitive proof that an innocent person has been executed in the past 50 years despite the shameful fact that since 1973, 100 condemned persons have had their convictions vacated by exonerating evidence.

Professor Cassell has been highly critical of studies that show significant rates of error in the imposition of capital punishment.

More than once, he has attacked a study showing errors in capital cases by declaring that the author is an avowed opponent of the death penalty, thereby attempting to undermine the credibility of the study's findings. He has also engaged in vitriolic and occasionally personal attacks against those with whom he disagrees on this issue, often skewing details in his own favor and publishing half-truths. His actions on this matter likewise call into question his ability to rule fairly on this most important legal issue.

Professor Cassell's views on habeas corpus tell a similar story. In April 1993, Professor Cassell testified before the Judiciary Committee in opposition to a bill that would have allowed death row inmates to raise new claims of actual innocence. The bill was a response to the Supreme Court's decision in Herrera v. Collins, which upheld a Texas rule barring courts from considering new evidence of innocence that is uncovered more than 30 days after conviction. In his testimony, Professor Cassell argued that an innocent defendant, "will be fully aware of the circumstances surrounding his innocence and can present them at trial." He further asserted that evidence that becomes available after conviction is, "almost invariably unreliable." It is troubling to imagine a district court judge with such biases, especially given the strong likelihood that he would be called upon to review claims of innocence based on newly discovered evidence.

Professor Cassell has also advocated limiting habeas review of claimed violations of Batson v. Kentucky, which prohibits the exercise of peremptory challenges on the basis of race or gender. In a 1992 law review article, he argued that Batson violations should be treated as harmless error, meaning that a new trial would never be an appropriate remedy for a Batson violation discovered for the first time on appeal. As an alternative remedy, he proposed notifying excluded jurors that had been unfairly excluded from the previous trial and inviting them to join the panel from which jurors are selected in a subsequent case. But such a "remedy" would do little to cure the structural flaw in the defendant's trial. Notably, although the Supreme Court has not ruled whether Batson violations are subject to harmless error analysis, the consensus among the Courts of Appeals is that they are not.

I am aware of Professor Cassell's work with regard to crime victims' rights. We still have more work to do to ensure that our criminal justice system is one that respects the rights and dignity of crime victims, rather than one that presents additional ordeals for those already victimized. Professor Cassell helped draft the Utah victims rights amendment in the mid-1990s. He also worked on, and testified in support of, some of the more than 60 versions of a Federal constitutional amendment that has been proposed, in recent Congresses, by Senators KYL and FEINSTEIN.

It is no secret that, as a longtime advocate of victims' rights, I believe it is preferable to broaden these rights by statute than by amending the Constitution. I do not, however, fault Professor Cassell, or anyone else, for supporting this approach. The treatment of crime victims certainly is of central importance to a civilized society. The question is not whether we should help victims, but how. I continue to believe that crime victims legislation is the preferable course to amending the Constitution.

That being said, Professor Cassell's work on behalf of this cause has occasionally exceeded the bounds of fair advocacy. For example, when testifying before this Committee in support of the proposed constitutional amendment, he has repeatedly cited the Victims Rights Clarification Act of 1997—VRCA—as evidence that statutes are not adequate for protecting crime victims, and that nothing but a constitutional amendment will do. While he has the right to favor an amendment to the constitution, Professor Cassell grossly distorted the impact of the VRCA.

Congress passed the VRCA in response to a pretrial order by the trial judge in the Timothy McVeigh case—Judge Matsch. The order excluded from the trial any victim who wanted to testify at the sentencing hearing. The VRCA clarified that a court may not prohibit a victim from testifying at a sentencing hearing solely because the victim has witnessed the trial, although a judge may exclude a victim from testifying at a sentencing hearing if the judge found—independent of the fact that the victim witnessed the trial—that the testimony would create unfair prejudice.

One week after President Clinton signed the VRCA, Judge Matsch reversed his pretrial order and permitted victims to watch the trial, even if they were potential penalty phase witnesses. In other words, Judge Matsch did what the statute told him to do. Beth Wilkinson, one of the prosecutors in the case, testified before this Committee that in the end, not one victim was prevented from testifying at the sentencing hearings for McVeigh on the ground that he or she had observed part of the trial. Moreover—and perhaps more importantly—with all issues regarding the VRCA resolved during the McVeigh case, there were no problems implementing the statute during the Terry Nichols case—victims were free to watch the trial and testify at the penalty phase hearing. Ms. Wilkinson characterized the VRCA as a textbook example of how statutes can and do work to protect victims.

When the Judiciary Committee considered the proposed constitutional amendment two years ago, many of us had serious concerns about that approach. We believed it possible to give crime victims strong and enforceable rights, and assure them a greater voice in the criminal justice system, without cutting back on the fundamental rights of defendants. Together with the Justice Department, we pushed for the addition of language that would expressly preserve existing rights of the accused as guaranteed by the Constitution.

Professor Cassell steadfastly opposed the addition of such language, claiming that it, "would have perpetuated the very problem we were trying to solve." This suggests that the "problem" as he saw it, was not that the judicial system mistreats victims, but that it is unduly deferential to the rights of defendants.

Professor Cassell now claims that the problem with "adding specific language about defendant's rights is that it creates . . . the misimpression that victims' rights and defendants' rights actually collide." This is a convenient "spin" on Professor Cassell's past statements, coming at a time when those remarks have come under scrutiny, and is clearly inconsistent with "the problem" he was "trying to solve" 2 years ago.

Once again, it raises the question whether Professor Cassell, if confirmed, would exercise judgment fairly and impartially or would do so in a way that would seek to further his own personal views.

I have no doubts about Professor Cassell's intelligence and his passion and commitment to how he thinks the law should read. I am sure that he is a fine professor of law. I suspect he may be an effective advocate. But when viewed as a whole, his career has been one of a results-oriented advocate, who has worked forcefully to push the law to the far right. His one-man war on Miranda, his aggressive defense of our flawed system of capital punishment, and his work on other matters place him outside the mainstream of modern American jurisprudence. Even more troubling is his clear track record of manipulating sources and data to promote his ideological agenda.

I have voted for 56 of the President's judicial nominees so far, and I will surely vote for many, many more, but on the basis of all I have seen in connection with the nomination of Paul Cassell, I cannot and will not vote in favor of this nomination. My judgment is that he is not likely to be the kind of fair and impartial judge that is essential to our Federal courts.

Mr. President, how much time remains for the Senator from Vermont?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont has 6½ minutes.

Mr. LEAHY. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Senator from California.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mrs. FEINSTEIN. Mr. President, I thank the ranking member.

Mr. President, I am very proud to rise in support of Professor Paul Cassell who is nominated to be a judge for the district court in Utah.

I think one of the best ways to learn about a person is to work with them on an issue. I have had the pleasure, along with Senator KYL, of working with Paul Cassell on a constitutional amendment to protect victims of violent crime.

In the course of several meetings, I have found Professor Cassell to be bright, sensitive, and evenhanded, with a very deep concern for those victimized by crime.

I am not the only one. I would like to quickly read the opening paragraph from Doug Beloof of Northwestern School of Law at the Lewis & Clark College:

> I am an associate professor of law at Lewis & Clark law school in Portland, Oregon. I am a registered Democrat. It has been my pleasure to know Professor Paul Cassell personally and professionally for several years. I am writing to urge you to confirm him. As his resume reflects, he is brilliant. He is one of the quickest conceptual thinkers and writers I have ever met. There is no question that he is well qualified for the district court position.

I find myself strongly in agreement. I have found in my course in public life that very few care really to be identified with victims of crime. In this sense, Paul Cassell is really a jewel. I have seen him come forward time after time on behalf of victims of violent crimes. On a pro bono basis, he represented the victims of the Oklahoma City bombing in their unsuccessful efforts to ensure they could observe the trial and still testify at the sentencing proceedings.

He has worked on behalf of sexual assault victims. This month he is filing briefs in the Utah Supreme Court on behalf of the Rape Recovery Center to protect the confidentiality of rape crisis victims.

Because of his tireless work on behalf of crime victims, Professor Cassell's nomination has earned the support of victim's groups around the country including: the Klaas Kids Foundation; Crime Victims United of California; the National Victims Constitutional; Amendment Network; Memory of Victims Everywhere; National Organization for Victim Assistance; and Justice for Murder Victims.

Let me a read just a couple excerpts from his letters of support:

John Stein, Deputy Director of the National Organization for Victim Assistance describes him as

> . . . a fair, ethical, and highly competent attorney and colleague. [Professor Cassell] has demonstrated a balanced commitment to the cause of justice for all Americans including crime victims.

Douglas Beloof, a Professor of Law at Lewis and Clark school in Portland, Oregon wrote:

> Professor Cassell's character and temperament . . . are extremely well suited for the District Court position. The citizens of Utah could not find a better legal mind or a more decent human being.

Professor Cassell also comes before the Senate with impressive academic credentials.

Professor Cassell graduated from Stanford University and from Stanford Law School, where he was Order of the Coif and president of the Stanford Law Review.

He clerked for then-Judge Antonin Scalia on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, and subsequently Chief Justice Warren Burger of the U.S. Supreme Court.

After a successful career in the Department of Justice, Mr. Cassell entered academia and became a professor of law at the University of Utah. His scholarship includes over 25 published law review articles.

In sum, I thank Chairman Leahy for setting this nomination for a vote, and I urge my colleagues to vote to confirm Professor Cassell to the Utah District Court.

I ask unanimous consent to print in the Record a series of letters from national organizations supporting victims and also supporting Dr. Paul Cassell for appointment to the district court.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Dear Senators Feinstein and Kyl: On behalf of the National Organization for Victim Assistance, we are writing to express our strong support for the confirmation of Professor Paul Cassell to the Federal District Court for the District of Utah.

We have worked with Professor Cassell for many years, and have come to know him as a fair, ethical, and highly competent attorney and colleague. Paul has demonstrated a balanced commitment to the cause of justice for all Americans, including crime victims. We are honored by his longstanding association with NOVA. In his work on the Crime Victims' Rights Amendment he has shown his ability to understand many different points of view, as is evidenced by his collaboration with another NOVA friend, Professor Lawrence Tribe.

We strongly believe that Professor Cassell will be a credit to the Federal Judiciary and we urge your unqualified support for his confirmation.

Very Truly Yours,

Re confirmation of Paul G. Cassell.

Hon. Dianne Feinstein,
U.S. Senate, Hart Senate Office Building,
Washington, DC.

Dear Senator Feinstein: On behalf of crime victims everywhere, please support the confirmation of Paul G. Cassell to the Federal District Court for the District of Utah. Historically, Professor Cassell has long been one of America's most active and vocal advocates of victim's rights.

As one who has been victimized by violent crime I understand how difficult it can be to find articulate, educated advocates for our position. Professor Cassell is one such person: a leader whom goes to battle for the rights of the innocent, especially crime victims. We need more, not less individuals of Professor Cassell's caliber working on behalf of all honest Americans.

Please support and vote 'aye' to confirm Professor Cassell. He will be a continuing asset to a federal court system that too often prioritizes the rights of the wrong individual.

Thank you for your consideration on this matter.

Sincerely,
Marc Klaas.

Re please give strong support to Paul G. Cassell for confirmation to the 10th Federal District Court.

Senator DIANNE FEINSTEIN,
Hart Senate Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR FEINSTEIN: As one of the hardest hit crime victims in the Nation, I extend my appreciation for your great effort on behalf of the victims of violent crime. Thank you for continuing to be a strong crime victim's advocate. We value your hard work and continued loyalty to bring forth a "U.S. Constitutional Amendment" for the rights of crime victims. [You may have been advised that after fourteen years an arrest has finally been made on one of the killers of my brother and sister-in-law.]

Knowing of Paul Cassell's wonderful work in the justice area, we would guess that you plan to support him for confirmation to the 10th Federal District Court. We do request your very strong support for him.

If you know of Mr. Cassell, you are aware he is a man totally dedicated to making our justice system fair for the honest, law-abiding citizen, who just happens to become a victim of crime.

In April 1996, I had the privilege of meeting Paul as we both testified before the U.S. Senate Judiciary in support of your U.S. Constitutional Amendment. Paul Cassell is a leader, doing battle for the rights of the honest people (especially crime victims). Paul has great integrity, fairness and we victims are proud to support him for the Federal District Court of our great Nation.

Thank you again and again for your great effort on behalf of victims of crime.

My kindest personal regards and with sincerity and appreciation,

COLLENE (THOMPSON) CAMPBELL

NATIONAL VICTIMS'
CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT NETWORK,
Denver, CO, March 13, 2002.

Hon. DIANNE FEINSTEIN,
Senator for California, Hart Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR FEINSTEIN: On behalf of the National Victims' Constitutional Amendment Network (NVCAN), I wish to express our strong support for Paul Cassell, Esquire, who has been nominated to serve as a federal judge. Those of us who have been privileged to know and work with Mr. Cassell have deep respect and admiration for his leadership and service to the criminal justice system and the society it serves.

Paul Cassell has a distinguished record of outstanding service to others. He is currently a Professor of Law at the University of Utah College of Law, where he teaches criminal procedure. He has written and lectured extensively regarding crime victims' rights, serving on the Utah Council on Victims, where he was instrumental in obtaining the passage of the Utah State Victims' Rights Amendment. He worked with total commitment and dedication on behalf of 89 victims of the Oklahoma City bombing in their efforts to obtain their lawful rights to watch proceedings in that case.

His career includes a wealth of experiences that reflect his exceptional ability to strive for balance and fairness in the criminal justice system so that true justice is achieved. Clearly, those qualities have been demonstrated in abundance as NVCAN has worked for the passage of the U.S. Constitutional amendment for crime victims' rights.

Paul Cassell is a man of honor and integrity who will bring a keen intellect, ethical conduct and distinction to the federal bench. We in NVCAN have witnessed him as one of our most active contributors and a passionate advocate for equal justice under the law. We hope you will carefully consider our strong support for his confirmation.

Sincerely,

ROBERTA ROPER,
ROBERT PRESTON,
Co-Chairpersons.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I will vote against the nomination of Professor Paul G. Cassell to be a Federal district judge in Utah. Mr. Cassell's nomination is the first of President Bush's judicial nominations that I have voted against on the Senate floor. Although Professor Cassell is a highly intelligent and forceful advocate of his views on criminal justice, he clearly lacks the temperament and moderation required for a life-tenured Federal judgeship.

Professor Cassell is perhaps best known for his longstanding criticism of and campaign to overturn the Supreme Court's decision in Miranda v. Arizona. Miranda held that police must provide certain warnings to suspects held in custody if their statements are to be later admitted into evidence. As the Supreme Court recently observed, Miranda "has become embedded in routine police practice to the point where the warnings have become part of our national culture." Across the Nation, law enforcement agencies have concluded that Miranda generally does not hinder their ability to investigate and prosecute crime.

Professor Cassell believes otherwise. He has written numerous law review articles arguing that Miranda was "an undeniable tragedy"—"the most damaging blow inflicted on law enforcement in the last half-century." Cassell's scholarship, however, has received withering criticism from his colleagues. For example, Professor Stephen Schulhofer has described Cassell's methodology as "inconsistent and highly partisan" and "junk science of the silliest sort." Professor Charles Weisselberg stated that his conclusions were based on "foolhardy assumptions" and "flawed methodologies." Professors Richard Leo and Richard Ofshe criticized Cassell for advancing "logically flawed and empirically erroneous propositions" that "appear to stem from his ideological commitments."

In addition to publishing law review articles, Professor Cassell filed amicus curiae briefs around the country seeking to convince courts that a Federal statute passed in 1968 effectively overruled Miranda and made voluntariness the sole test for the admissibility of confessions in Federal criminal cases. At the time of this statute's enactment, I stated that it was "so squarely in conflict with the recent decision of the Supreme Court in Miranda that it will almost certainly be declared unconstitutional as soon as it is tested in the courts."

Fully aware of this infirmity, the Justice Department, from the Johnson administration onward, Democratic and Republican administrations alike, made no serious effort to test the statute's constitutionality in court. Nevertheless, in the 1990's, Professor Cassell singled out the Clinton Justice Department for vigorous attack, the same Department that saw the overall crime rate in the United States decline for 8 out of 8 years, and violent crime drop to its lowest point in two decades. Because the Clinton Justice Department failed to endorse his flawed scholarship, Cassell accused it of "a clear constitutional abdication." He declared that Attorney General Janet Reno had "team[ed] up with defense lawyers to let armed felons and other criminals escape prosecution." Imagine that, stating that about an Attorney General. At his nomination hearing before the Judiciary Committee, Cassell declined to express any regret for these outrageous and unfounded statements.

In June 2000, in Dickerson v. United States, the Supreme Court vindicated the Justice Department's longstanding position. In an opinion written by Chief Justice Rehnquist, seven justices of the Supreme Court held that Miranda was a "constitutional rule" that may not be overruled by a statute. Professor Cassell described the Court's ruling as a "remarkable example of the imperial judiciary." He proceeded to argue, in both a law review article and a Federalist Society newsletter, that the ruling lacked precedential value. He described as "a silver lining" in the "dark cloud of the decision" the extraordinary statement by Justice Scalia and Justice Thomas, in dissent, that they would continue to apply the unconstitutional statute in all future cases. Cassell wrote, "Perhaps the view of the Dickerson dissenters will become a majority. Truth, after all, is hard to keep buried forever. . . ."

Thus, in his scholarship and in his public statements on Miranda, Professor Cassell has shown himself to be intemperate and one-sided. He refuses to admit that his opponents might have a case even after their position has been vindicated by seven justices of the Supreme Court. Furthermore, his criticism of the Court calls into question his commitment to the principle of stare decisis and his ability to separate his view of the "truth" from settled law. Is this the kind of person we want to serve as a Federal judge?

I am equally troubled by Professor Cassell's views on the death penalty. Reasonable minds can disagree about the death penalty, and we have confirmed and continue to confirm many nominees who believe that capital punishment is an appropriate response to crime. My opposition to Professor Cassell's nomination is based not on his support for the death penalty, but instead on his refusal to even acknowledge the evidence showing that serious problems exist in its implementation.

Since 1973, 100 people have been released from death row in the United States because of innocence. In many cases, fatal mistakes were avoided only because of discoveries made by students or journalists, not the courts. This high number of exonerations has led many observers, both liberal and conservative, to express concern about the fairness of the death penalty's administration. For example, Justice O'Connor has observed that "if statistics are any indication, the system may well be allowing some innocent defendants to be executed." There are now death penalty moratoriums in two States, Illinois and Maryland, imposed after leaders in each state recognized serious concerns about racial disparities and the possibility that an innocent person might be executed.

Professor Cassell has spent his academic career minimizing and dismissing such concerns. In spite of the 100 death-row exonerations, Cassell has described the chance that an innocent might be put to death as an "urban legend." He has asserted again and again that there is no definitive evidence that any innocent person has been executed in the last 30 years: "Thus," he has argued, "the most important error rate—the rate of mistaken executions—is zero." Elsewhere, Cassell has trivialized the danger of fatal error in the Government's administration of the death penalty by comparing it to the risk involved in driving on a highway, stating that even though innocents may die in traffic accidents, "we all agree that our highways should remain open because of the social benefits they produce."

In 1993, Professor Cassell testified in opposition to a bill that would allow death-row inmates to raise new claims of actual innocence in habeas corpus proceedings, arguing that "[i]f a defendant is truly innocent, he will be fully aware of the circumstances surrounding his innocence and can present them at trial." Evidence discovered after trial, he stated, is "almost invariably unreliable." As a district judge, Cassell will be charged with the duty of reviewing post-trial petitions by State and Federal prisoners, many of which raise claims of innocence. His unorthodox view of the reliability of newly discovered evidence is inconsistent with that fundamental duty.

Regardless of how we feel about the death penalty generally, there is one thing that we can all agree on. People on trial for their lives must have effective assistance of counsel, not lawyers who sleep through the trial. Professor Cassell, however, has expressed a different view. In October 2000, a divided panel of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the death sentence in one such case, in which the defense lawyer had repeatedly slept through the trial for substantial periods of time. Professor Cassell defended this decision in an interview on National Public Radio, emphasizing that there was "no real suggestion" that the defendant was innocent. The en banc fifth circuit later reversed the panel's decision and reinstated the district court's grant of habeas corpus relief. It held that "when a state court finds on the basis of credible evidence that defense counsel repeatedly slept as evidence was being introduced against a defendant, that defendant has been denied counsel at a critical stage of his trial." Cassell's willingness to affirm a death sentence in a case where the defense lawyer slept through the trial raises fundamental questions about his suitability to serve as a Federal judge.

A number of lawyers from Utah have written letters to the Judiciary Committee regarding Professor Cassell's nomination. They have expressed concern about his lack of ties to Utah and limited courtroom experience. Ronald J. Yengich wrote that Cassell has not been "intellectually honest in his assessment of the problems of crime in our society and the response that the Courts should take to them," and that he has shown "an unwillingness to view both sides of any legal argument." L. Clark Donaldson wrote that Cassell's legal scholarship has elevated "partisan considerations over careful and deliberate analysis of data." Kristine M. Rogers stated that his comments have led her "to conclude that he views our justice system as a mechanism with which he can manipulate our Government with an agenda for ever increasing governmental power and ever decreasing individual rights." Stephen M. Enderton, a self-described Republican, believes that Cassell "would use his position to push his personal ultra conservative agenda to the detriment of all of those who appear before his court."

I hope that my concerns and the concerns of these Utah lawyers are misplaced, and that as a judge Professor Cassell will be able to set aside ideology and apply the law fairly and impartially. His record, however, indicates otherwise. I therefore oppose this nomination, and I urge my colleagues not to approve it.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I want to respond to remarks made by my colleague from Massachusetts about criticism of Professor Cassell's scholarship.

Academic debate about such issues as Miranda and the death penalty is robust and uninhibited. It is part of that debate that scholars will criticize the work of other scholars. The validity of that criticism depends, of course, on the merits of the particular claims.

Professor Schulhofer and Professor Cassell have engaged in a particularly long-running debate about the merits of Miranda and its potential costs to law enforcement. Schulhofer has criticized Cassell's work in various law review articles, and Cassell has responded in other articles. The full debate spans dozens of pages in various law reviews. Some of the relevant articles are as follows: Paul G. Cassell, Miranda's Costs; En Empirical Reassessment, 90 Nw. U.L. Rev. 387 (1996) (suggesting that confession rates fell after Miranda); Stephen J. Schulhofer, Miranda's Practical Effect: Substantial Benefits and Vanishingly Small Social Costs, 90 Nw. U.L. Rev. 500 (1996) (agreeing that rates may have fallen modestly, but arguing against significance of this fact); Paul G. Cassell, All Benefits, No Costs: The Grand Illusion of Miranda's Defenders, 90 Nw. U.L. Rev. 1084 (1996) (responding to Schulhofer's criticisms, noting decline in crime clearance rates after Miranda); Stephen J. Schulhofer, Bashing Miranda is Unjustified—and Harmful, 20 Harv. J. of Law and Public Policy 347 (1997) (arguing that post-Miranda clearance rate decline is explainable by other factors); Paul G. Cassell, Miranda's "Negligible" Effect on Law Enforcement: Some Skeptical Observations, 20 Harv. J.L. & Pub. Policy. 327 (1997) (responding to Schulhofer's criticisms); Paul G. Cassell & Richard Fowles, Handcuffing the Cops? A Thirty-Year Perspective on Miranda's Harmful Effects on Law Enforcement, 50 Stan. L. Rev. 1055 (1998) (multiple regression analysis of crime clearance rates suggesting structural drop in clearance rate function after Miranda). As explained in greater detail in those articles, Cassell believes that it is important to attempt to calculate the costs of the Miranda decision, even though the data that may be available for such a calculation is limited.

Professors Richard A. Leo and Richard J. Ofshe have criticized Cassell's work on false confessions, often in particularly strong terms. Unlike the other academic exchanges in which Cassell has been involved, this dispute has been litigated in several court cases. Criminal defendants have offered the paid "expert" testimony of Professors Leo and Ofshe in support of their defenses. Prosecutors have presented Cassell's writings in response, arguing that Leo and Ofshe are not sufficiently reliable to be allowed to testify. Several courts have agreed with my critiques of their work. For example, in one fairly recent case, a Federal district court concluded that proffered testimony on false confessions by Professor Leo would not satisfy the reliability requirements for scientific evidence. The court held: "Therefore the motion to call Dr. Leo will be denied. I find there is inadequate showing that the reasoning or methodology underlying the proffered testimony is reliable nor has it gained acceptance in the relevant scientific community." See United States v. Juan Carlos Higuera-Cruz No. 99CR 2975–TW (S.D. Cal. Feb. 8, 2000), tr. at 145. The court cited Cassell's research as one reason for reaching its conclusion. After reviewing Cassell's article in the Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy, the court explained: "Professor Cassell . . . concluded that all nine people were in fact, likely guilty. . . . That, at the very least, casts doubt on the methodology o[f] the study that Dr. Leo conducted and whether or not it is substantially or scientifically reliable or valid." See id. at 142–43.

In a similar ruling handed down recently, a State district court judge in New Mexico also found Professor Leo to be unreliable. Tracking arguments that Cassell made in his article, the court explained: "While the area of specialty of Dr. Leo is an important area of study, nevertheless, as recognized by Dr. Leo, there are considerable limitations which presently exist for the analysis of interrogation techniques and their bearing upon false confessions." State v. Lance Four Star, No. D–0101–CR–2000000276, op. at 1–2 (1st Jud. D.C. of New Mex., Aug. 23, 2001). Moreover, the court explained: "The conclusions of Dr. Leo are arrived at from an analysis of a small number of cases (sixty) which are not randomly selected. . . . Even if one were to concede the methodology of determining whether a confession is false to a high probability, the numbers used are extremely small." Id. at 2. There are other cases to similar effect (both in the United States and Canada) finding either Professor Leo's or Professor Ofshe's work to be insufficiently reliable to be admitted in court.

Professor George Thomas and Professor Cassell have enjoyed debating the Miranda issue in various fora. Their most extensive debate appeared in the UCLA Law Review. See George C. Thomas III, Is Miranda A Real-World Failure? A Plea for More (and Better) Empirical Evidence, 43 UCLA L. Rev. 821 (1996) (calling for empirical research on Miranda); Paul G. Cassell & Bret S. Hayman, Police Interrogation in the 1990s: An Empirical Study of the Effects of Miranda, 43 UCLA L. Rev. 839 (1996) (providing empirical research on Miranda); George C. Thomas III, Plain Talk about the Miranda Empirical Debate: A "Study-State" Theory of Confession, 43 UCLA L. Rev. 933 (1996) (noting that "Cassell and Hayman have performed a great service to the criminal justice community by gathering, categorizing, and presenting the Salt Lake County data. Though I interpret some of the data differently than Cassell and Hayman do, the debate is richer because of their data;" offering critique of the study). Professor Thomas has sent a letter to the Judiciary Committee strongly endorsing Cassell's nomination.

Professor Charles D. Weisselberg has also critiqued Cassell's work. His critique, however, is really more of a summary of the critiques of other scholars. He also said that he was analyzing Cassell's work "because it represents the most detailed and determined empirical effort to measure Miranda's costs." He also notes that Cassell's regression analysis was replicated, for two crime categories, by Professor John Donohue and that, after "careful study, Donohue could neither substantiate nor reject Cassell's and Fowles's claims." Because Weisselberg is summarizing the critique of Cassell's research, more extensive responses are found in the law review articles responding to those critiques.

Professor Welsh White has critiqued Cassell's use of an estimate of wrongful convictions from an Ohio judge. Professor White has found Cassell's work sufficiently meritorious to devote significant parts of a book to responding to his views. See Welsh S. White, Miranda's Waning Protections: Police Interrogation Practices After Dickerson 72 (2001) (noting that chapter 7 of the book will discuss my empirical arguments and chapter 8 will discuss my constitutional arguments). It may be relevant to note that Professor White teachers at the University of Pittsburgh School of Law. In September 200, Cassell delivered the Mellon Lecture at his school.

Finally, in considering criticisms of Cassell's work, it might also be useful to consider praise of his work. Some of the published favorable comments on Cassell's work include: Yale Kamisar, Can (Did) Congress "Overrule" Miranda, 85 Cornell L. Rev. 883 (200) (noting "the compelling presence on the scene of Professor Paul Cassell"); Judge Alex Kozinski, The Fourth Annual Frankel Lecture: The Relevance of Legal Scholarship to the Judiciary and Legal Community: Who Gives a Hott About Legal Scholarship?, 37 Hous. L. Rev. 295 (2000) (reviewing Cassell's academic research on Miranda, which lead to the Dickerson decision; concluding "this strikes me as a monumental academic achievement . . . Cassell, through his academic writings, has given this issue legitimacy, and an argument that a mere five years ago would have been received with a chuckle may now turn out to be the law of the land"); Michael Edmund O'Neill, Undoing Miranda, 2000 BYU L. Rev. 185 (noting doctrinal uncertainties about Miranda and concluding "Professor Cassell has offered perhaps the best answer to this perplexing question").

Thank you, Mr. President. I yield the floor.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I cannot support the confirmation of this nominee for the Federal district court. To cite just one instance of his intemperate remarks, Mr. Cassell wrote in a published article that the U.S. Department of Justice "team(ed) up with criminal defense lawyers to let armed felons and other criminals escape prosecution." Statements such as this, and there are others, show an absence of the judicial temperament necessary to warrant a lifetime appointment to the Federal court.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, I rise today to express my support for President Bush's nomination of Paul G. Cassell for the U.S. District Court for the District of Utah. The Judiciary Committee approved Professor Cassell by voice vote on May 2, 2002, and I would urge my colleagues to vote in favor of this nomination.

Paul Cassell has excellent academic credentials. He graduated from Stanford University Law School, where he was president of the Stanford Law Review. Following law school he served two clerkships, one for then-Judge Antonin Scalia on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, and one for Chief Justice Warren Burger of the U.S. Supreme Court. Cassell's professional experience includes service as an Assistant U.S. Attorney and also Associate Deputy Attorney General at the U.S. Department of Justice. As a professor at the University of Utah College of Law, he distinguished himself as a popular and well-respected teacher. His scholarship includes over 25 published law review articles, as well as numerous articles in major newspapers and periodicals.

Professor Cassell has become a national expert on criminal procedure and evidence and one of the Nation's leading experts on victims' rights. He has represented victims of crime across the country, always on a pro bono basis. For instance, he represented victims of the Oklahoma City bombing in their efforts to observe the trial and sentencing proceedings. His advocacy is the reason why those families did not lose the right to observe the McVeigh trial. Recently, his pro bono efforts resulted in a significant victory for victims of crime in the Utah Supreme Court. On March 12, 2002, in State v. Casey, the court agreed with Professor Cassell that crime victims have the right to be heard before any plea bargain is accepted by the court and the right to appeal issues relating to that right. As a result of Cassell's efforts, this opinion recognized that victims have an important role to play in our criminal justice system and that their rights must be respected by courts and prosecutors.

Professor Cassell has also been actively involved in fighting domestic violence and sexual assault in Utah. In April 2002, Professor Cassell filed briefs in the Utah Supreme Court on behalf of the Rape Recovery Center and the National Alliance to End Sexual Violence to protect the confidentiality of rape crisis counseling records. Additionally, Professor Cassell has been an active participant in legal affairs in Utah. For many years, he has served as the chair of the Legislative Committee of the Utah Council on Victims of Crime as well as a member on the Utah Supreme Court's Advisory Committee on Rules of Criminal Procedure.

In previous weeks many of my colleagues have highlighted the need to address the vacancy crisis in the Federal courts. I am concerned that there are some in the Senate who are perpetuating this vacancy. The Senate must do its part to act swiftly on the President's nominees. I have voiced concern in the past that certain Senators have made it known that they will require that a nominee be recommended by the American Bar Association. While I believe that this is an unnecessary requirement and an extra-constitutional test, Paul Cassell has, nonetheless, passed this test and a substantial majority of the American Bar Association review committee rates him "well qualified" to be a Federal judge.

Paul Cassell's long list of credentials indicate his preparedness to serve as a Federal judge. I strongly urge my colleagues to vote in favor of the nomination of Paul G. Cassell for the U.S. District Court for the District of Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. LEAHY. How much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont has 56 seconds. The Senator from Utah has 1 minute.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I have told the Senator from Utah I will let him go last.

I have no doubts about Professor Cassell's intelligence, his passion, and his commitment to how he thinks the law should read. I am sure he is a fine professor of law. I suspect he is an effective advocate. But viewed as a whole, his career has been one of a results-oriented advocate where he has worked forcefully to push the law to the far right. His one-man war on Miranda, his aggressive defense of our flawed system of capital punishment, even though 100 people have been released because of mistakes, and his work on other matters place him outside the mainstream of modern American jurisprudence. Even more troubling is his clear track record of manipulating sources and data to promote his ideological agenda.

I have voted for 56 of the last 57 of the President's judicial nominees so far, and I will surely vote for many, many more, but on the basis of all I have seen in connection with the nomination of Paul Cassell, I cannot and will not vote in favor of this nomination. My judgment is that he is not likely to be the kind of fair and impartial judge that is essential to our Federal courts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, it seems ironic to me that my colleagues are attacking Paul Cassell for having used yeoman efforts to uphold a Federal statute that was passed by the Congress of the United States in 29 U.S.C. 3501 which basically said that voluntary confessions will be admitted into evidence if there is just a technical mistake. I have to say I believe that is ridiculous. I think he had every right to try to uphold that statute. Personally, I think he was right in his arguments, but the Supreme Court found otherwise. He made it very clear that that is the law now and he will abide by it.

I also disagree with my colleagues who characterize him again as manipulating statistics and figures. There are people who disagree with Paul Cassell, as is the case in academia. He disagrees with them. But I happen to know this is one of the most honorable, honest people who lives in our society today. I personally don't appreciate his being treated this way.

It pains me to hear my colleagues attacking Paul Cassell, one of the most stellar nominees this body has ever had the privilege of considering for confirmation to the district court bench.

I have to say that, even before those disparaging remarks were made, it was already an embarrassment to me that the Judiciary Committee and Senate leadership have taken nearly a year—328 days to be exact—to bring Professor Cassell's nomination to a floor vote. This is by far the longest time that any district court nominee has had to wait for a vote during this Congress. In fact, this vote has been delayed so long that the Administrative Office of the Courts declared the seat to which Professor Cassell was nominated a judicial emergency several months ago.

But rather than just register my disbelief and disappointment, I would like to address the two issues that the critics and nay-sayers are bringing up: Professor Cassell's work in the areas of capital punishment and the so-called Miranda warning.

Mr. President, don't let anyone fool you: The fact is that Cassell's views on these topics reflect thoughtful, responsible, mainstream legal ideas. And Cassell's work in these areas has been driven by nothing other that a deeply felt desire to improve the justice system for the benefit of all Americans. So, rather than let my colleagues misstate and mis-characterize those views, I would like to explain what Professor Cassell really thinks on these topics.

First, capital punishment. Professor Cassell, like many scholars, jurists, and a majority of the population of the United States, supports capital punishment in appropriate cases. Cassell has argued that Congress and the States have the power to impose capital punishment for those who have committed the most serious offenses representing the wanton, willful, and reckless disregard for innocent human life. The fact that he has had the courage to say so in today's monolithic academic culture should be taken as evidence of his ability to think independently in the face of peer pressure—a quality we want in judges. But that courage has led people who disagree with him to attempt to reduce his views to mere caricatures. His critics are trying to make-believe that he has a callous attitude toward anyone wrongly sentenced to death. But nothing could be further from the truth. Cassell's support for capital punishment is tempered by his expressed commitment to ensure that innocent persons are not executed. Professor Cassell has said so in his writings and proven so by his actions. For instance, Professor Cassell has helped his law school, the University of Utah College of Law, raise funds for its recently formed Rocky Mountain Innocence Project, whose goal is to identify defendants who have been wrongfully convicted of capital or other crimes. Cassell has also offered the Project his legal services, pro bono, to help pursue the first case that the Project identifies. Cassell has also supported Utah's recently enacted Post-Conviction Testing of DNA Act. The act, one of the first in the country, provides for state-financed testing of potentially exculpatory DNA evidence when DNA testing was not available at trial. As you can see, Mr. President, Professor Cassell is a thoughtful and principled mainstream legal thinker whose views are entirely consistent with the majority of Americans.

The second area of Cassell's advocacy and scholarship that I would like to address concerns the so-called Miranda warnings. But Mr. President, before I explain the underlying issues here, I think it is even more important to note that, even those who have disagreed with Cassell on the specifics of Miranda recognize that he would fair-mindedly follow the law. Michigan Law Professor Yale Kamisar, the nation's leading academic defender of Miranda, has said: "Cassell's a smart guy, and even though he doesn't like Miranda, I think he'd apply it conscientiously as a judge." This observation—that Cassell is committed to following the law, is really all that any Senator should need to know. But let me explain further.

Many people know that Professor Cassell argued in the Supreme Court last year in support of a statute enacted by Congress that purported to modify some of the complex rules that have grown up around the Miranda holding. The case was called Dickerson v. United States. In Dickerson, FBI agents questioned an armed bank robber and obtained incriminating statements. It was undisputed that these statements were given voluntarily. However, there was a dispute as to whether the Miranda warnings had been given to the bank robber before or after the questioning. After the district court ruled that these voluntary statements could not be used as evidence against the defendants, Cassell briefed and argued the matter in the fourth circuit as a friend of the court.

Cassell's position was that Congress, in enacting a law known as §3501, had validly required these voluntary statements to be admitted into evidence, even if there was a technical dispute over the timing of the warnings. The Fourth Circuit agreed with Cassell. The Supreme Court later asked Cassell to argue that position on appeal, which he did. After considering the argument, a majority of the Supreme Court disagreed with Cassell's position and ruled for the other side. As Cassell told the Judiciary Committee, because of his personal involvement in that case, there's probably no one who understands the settled law on Miranda better than Cassell.

Mr. President, any one who knows anything about law knows that a lawyer's arguments in court do not always necessarily reflect his or her own personal views on the topic. In fact, it is a very important principle in our legal system that clients on both sides of an issue deserve forceful advocates for their position. So it is simply specious for anyone to pretend that every argument in Dickerson reflects Professor Cassell's personal opinion. In fact, it is worse than specious—it is downright misrepresentation. That's because Professor Cassell has written law review articles—not for a client, but on his own—in which he argues for a more modest public policy change than he advocated in the Dickerson case. Cassell's own article urge that police officers should continue to give most of the Miranda warnings, but suggests that some of the warnings should be modified and replaced with the requirement that police officers videotape interrogations as better insurance that constitutional rights are respected. After all, a true record of police interrogations is much better evidence of voluntariness than the simple fact that the policeman remembered to read the Miranda warning. This argument has been adopted by many civil libertarians, who agree with Cassell that videotaping would more effectively protect against police abuses and suspects who are wrongfully persuaded to falsely confess.

In other words, Mr. President, Professor Cassell's position on the Miranda warnings could actually offer more, rather than less, protection for Americans against possible abuse by police. So any attempt to pigeon-hole Professor Cassell as not supporting the rights of criminal defendants is a gross caricature of his reasoned and thoughtful analysis of how best to reform the criminal justice process in order to protect the very rights that some accuse him of disregarding.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues not to be taken in by inaccurate or false representations of Cassell's record. It is one thing for people to disagree—which I certainly respect. But it is quite another to carelessly or purposely mislead others into misunderstanding the real arguments. In the case of Professor Cassell, his positions on capital punishment and the Miranda warnings are thoughtful and reasonable views, held by many mainstream legal thinkers like himself. And the most important fact of all is that Professor Cassell knows the difference between the roles of the advocate and the judge, and he has committed to follow the law. I again urge my colleagues to vote to confirm Paul Cassell, who, I am convinced, will be a principled and fair-minded judge who applies the law impartially as written and interpreted.

Mr. LEAHY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There appears to be a sufficient second.

ANDEAN TRADE PREFERENCE EXPANSION ACT—Resumed

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the pending business.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 3009) to extend the Andean Trade Preference Act, to grant additional trade benefits under that Act, and for other purposes.

Pending:

Baucus/Grassley amendment No. 3401, in the nature of a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

AMENDMENT NO. 3405 TO AMENDMENT NO. 3401

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I ask an amendment at the desk be called up relating to investor—State relationships with respect to chapter 11.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Montana [Mr. BAUCUS], for himself, Mr. GRASSLEY, and Mr. WYDEN, proposes an amendment numbered 3405 to amendment No. 3401.

Mr. BAUCUS. I ask unanimous consent the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

(Purpose: To clarify the principal negotiating objectives of the United States with respect to foreign investment)

On page 229, line 23, strike all through "United States," on line 25, and insert the following: "foreign investors in the United States are not accorded greater rights than United States investors in the United States,".

Mr. BAUCUS. This is an amendment I am offering on behalf of myself, Senator GRASSLEY, and Senator WYDEN. Our amendment concerns an investor-State dispute settlement. That is the "chapter 11 question" as it has come to be called. It is based on the placement of investor-State provisions in NAFTA.

This is not bankruptcy chapter 11. It has nothing to do with bankruptcy. When I say "chapter 11," it sometimes causes confusion, but this is chapter 11 in NAFTA.

Our amendment modifies the objective on investment in the trade bill to make clear that foreign investors in the United States should not be accorded a higher level of protection of their rights than U.S. citizens in the United States.

There has been a lot of discussion of NAFTA chapter 11 in recent days. In particular, a number of Senators have expressed legitimate concerns about the impact that chapter 11, and other similar provisions in other agreements, may have on the ability of State and local governments to regulate—that is, to adopt and enforce laws that protect the public health, safety, and welfare.

There is a growing consensus that we need to make sure that new trade and investment agreements don't give foreign investors in the United States greater rights than we give our own citizens. International agreements must not become a back door for expanded protection of foreign investors at the expense of protection of our environment, health, and safety.

This view has been strongly and consistently expressed by various State and local government organizations, as well as environmental organizations, in recent weeks.

For example, a resolution adopted by the National Association of Attorneys General at their March meeting encourages Congress:

> . . . to ensure that in any new legislation providing for international trade agreements foreign investors shall receive no greater rights to financial compensation than those afforded to our citizens.

A letter last week from a large coalition of environmental groups, including Defenders of Wildlife, Friends of the Earth, the Sierra Club, and the National Wildlife Federation, urged the Senate to:

> . . . require that trade and investment agreements do not provide foreign corporations with greater rights than U.S. citizens have under the Constitution.

Similarly, a recent letter from the president of the National Wildlife Federation to Ambassador Zoellick states:

> An important step to restore consensus would be to make clear in fast track legislation and in investment agreements that those brining expropriation challenges under investment rules will not be granted rights greater than those provided under the takings jurisprudence of the U.S. Constitution.

The United States Conference of Mayors has expressed its concern that the bill as now drafted:

> . . . would allow trade officials to include investor protection standards in future trade agreements that go beyond U.S. law and that effectively grant foreign investors greater rights than U.S. citizens enjoy.

In another letter, the National Association of Counties expresses its concern that under the trade bill:

> . . . foreign investors operating in the U.S. would have greater legal rights against our government than our own citizens possess.

Each of these organizations makes an excellent point. We have heard their message, and that is why we have offered the present amendment. We want to make sure that in protecting the rights of U.S. citizens abroad, our negotiators do not inadvertently encroach on the prerogatives of Government here at home. This amendment seeks to strike the right balance between these different sets of interests.

The bill's objective on investment opens with a statement recognizing that—on the whole—U.S. law provides a level of protection of investment that is:

> . . . consistent with or greater than the level required by international law.

It goes on to state that our negotiators should ensure that:

> United States investors in the United States are not accorded lesser rights than foreign investors in the United States.

Some have read this language to imply that negotiators might seek to give foreign investors more rights than U.S. citizens now enjoy, and then seek to amend U.S. law to enhance the rights of U.S. citizens. In other words, they read this language as a mandate to expand individual property rights in the U.S. through the back door of international negotiations.

Let me be very clear in stating that that was not what the language at issue was intended to accomplish. The committee report on the bill emphasizes that obligations the U.S. undertakes in investment agreements:

> . . . should not result in foreign investors being entitled to compensation for government measures where a similarly situated U.S. investor would not be entitled to relief.

In other words, the rights of U.S. investors under U.S. law define the ceiling. Negotiators must not enter into agreements that grant foreign investors rights that breach that ceiling.

The amendment we have laid down is intended to foreclose any doubt on this question. It is our objective to negotiate agreements that protect the rights of U.S. persons abroad. But we are not willing to sacrifice the regulatory functions of our own Government in order to obtain that objective.

As the letters I quoted attest, getting clarity on this point is the number one priority for many of the organizations that have written about chapter 11. They make a fair point. Given the interests at stake, we must be crystal clear about the ground rules. U.S. negotiators must not conclude agreements that give foreign investors greater protection of their property rights than our own citizens already enjoy. Our well-developed law should define the ceiling. The amendment that we offer today makes that unmistakable.

The chapter 11 issues are some of the most challenging to confront us in the fast track debate. Important questions about the needs of Government and the rights of individuals are at stake. I believe that the Finance Committee bill struck a very good balance. I believe that the amendment we have laid down makes that balance even better, and I urge my colleagues to support it.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished colleague from Montana for offering this amendment. I think it helps improve what is already an excellent bill.

First, I want to make it clear that the bipartisan trade promotion authority bill currently pending in the Senate goes further than any prior bill to address concerns about potential abuse of the investor-State dispute process. At the same time, the bill recognizes that protecting U.S. investors abroad is also an extremely important objective. In short, the bill is balanced. Some people are attempting to undermine that balance. I think that is a mistake.

Foreign investment is closely interrelated to trade. Companies invest abroad to get closer to markets, acquire new technologies, form strategic alliances, and enhance competitiveness by integrating production and distribution. When they invest abroad, U.S. companies often become consumers of U.S. exports—either from affiliated entities or other U.S. companies.

The importance of international investment to the U.S. economy is large and growing. The United States receives more than 30 percent of worldwide investment. According to the U.S. Bureau of Economic Analysis, foreign investment in the United States grew sevenfold between 1994 and 2000, reaching almost $317 billion last year. As of 1998, foreign companies had invested over $3.5 trillion in the United States. They employed 5.6 million people and paid average annual salaries of over $46,000, well above the average salary for U.S. workers as a whole.

The ability of U.S. companies to invest abroad is also vital to U.S. economic growth and U.S. exports. Between 1994 and 2000, U.S. investment abroad doubled from $73 billion to $148 billion. U.S. investment abroad is critical to support a more dynamic and flexible U.S. economy, greater export flows and higher paying jobs for American workers.

For the last 25 years, each successive administration has recognized that it is critical to negotiate strong, objective and fair investment protections in our international agreements to continue to promote such investment. These traditional investment protections are largely based on U.S. law and policy and established international law rules of which the U.S. has been the chief architect and advocate.

The Senate Finance Committee gave very careful consideration to investment issues and some concerns expressed about NAFTA chapter 11 when we discussed H.R. 3005, the bipartisan Trade Promotion Authority Act.

Both Republican and Democratic members of the committee agreed to several improvements to the U.S. negotiating position on investment, which include: providing a mechanism for the early dismissal of frivolous claims, injecting greater transparency into arbitration proceedings, and establishing a review mechanism.

The bill and accompanying report also provide the committee's views on ensuring that U.S. investors abroad enjoy protections comparable to those available to foreign investors in the United States under existing U.S. law, while at the same time not making our own regulations unduly subject to treaty challenge on grounds that have no foundation in U.S. law and practice.

The degree of support for the final product is demonstrated by a strong bipartisan committee vote of 18 to 3 in favor of the bill.

These provisions represent a very careful balance between the political concerns raised by particular cases under the NAFTA chapter 11 process and the need to continue to provide U.S. citizens with strong investment protections overseas.

Yet, some Members still have concerns that foreign investors in the United States will receive greater rights under these provisions than U.S. investors in the United States receive. The amendment we are offering today makes it clear that this is not the case. It is a good improvement to an already excellent bill. I urge my colleagues to support it.

● Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I want to speak just briefly about the chairman's amendment. I understand what the Senator is trying to do with this amendment, and I appreciate his efforts to seek common ground. He has not had an easy job trying to steer this omnibus trade package through very stormy seas.

I am grateful for the chairman's willingness to be responsive to some of the concerns that I—and others—have raised. However, on the issue of investor-State dispute settlement, I am afraid that substantial disagreement remains. The Baucus-Grassley amendment makes a minor change to the bill. It is certainly better than the current language, but it just does not do a good enough job of protecting the ability of Federal, State and local governments to enact legitimate public health and safety legislation.

As my colleagues know by now, it is clear that NAFTA's investor-State dispute resolution process popularly known as "Chapter 11"—will be the model upon which future such agreements are predicated. Chapter 11 is a flawed model, not a failed model. I believe that having an investor-State dispute settlement process in a trade agreement is vital to ensuring that U.S. investors are able to invest abroad with confidence—but it needs to be improved.

Regrettably, the Baucus-Grassley amendment does not despite what its proponents claim—effectively address the shortcomings in the chapter 11 model. Adopting the Baucus-Grassley language without other needed changes will still allow future chapter 11-like tribunals to rule against legitimate U.S. public health and safety laws using a standard of expropriation that goes well beyond the clear standard that the Supreme Court has established in all its expropriation cases.

The amendment before us does not give any assurances that the due process clause of the Constitution will be respected, nor does it provide safe harbor for legitimate U.S. public health and safety laws.

Without all of these safeguards, future investor-State dispute settlement bodies can run roughshod over the ability of State and local governments—or even the Federal Government—to make laws to protect the public. I have an amendment that I believe will make those improvements to the underlying bill, and I intend to offer that amendment soon.

I will not oppose the pending amendment because it does not make the underlying bill any worse. But let us be clear: the chapter 11 model is flawed. Any suggestions that the Baucus-Grassley amendment takes care of these problems are simply incorrect.

So I think we should adopt this amendment by unanimous consent, but I do believe that the Senate should have a thorough debate on this issue.●

MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent the Senate now proceed to a period of morning business with Senators allowed to speak therein for a period not to exceed 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TRIBUTE TO JOHN MORAN

Mr. LOTT. Mr. President, I rise today to take a moment to recognize the public service of John A. Moran, who resigned from the Federal Maritime Commission on April 15 to return to private life. While I want to congratulate John on his recent move, I also want to acknowledge and thank him for his service at the FMC.

John was born and raised in a port and shipbuilding community, something I consider a good start for any young man. I live in a port and shipbuilding community, and there is no better way to understand the importance of the maritime industry to the Nation's economy that to grow up in the presence of the businesses and people that daily bring the goods of our trading partners to our door and carry America's products to the world. While John was born in Hampton Roads, Virginia, not Mississippi, he is redeemed somewhat in my eyes by the fact that his parents and family are good Mississippians.

John developed an interest in maritime law at Washington and Lee University School of Law in Lexington, Virginia. This interest was encouraged during the year he clerked for the Honorable Richard B. Kellam in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia. Judge Kellam shared with John his own love and enthusiasm for Admiralty Law and encouraged John to continue to maritime studies at Tulane University School of Law in New Orleans, Louisiana.

I first met John when he served as Republican Counsel to the Merchant Marine Subcommittee and the National Ocean Policy Study of the Senate's Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation. He came to this position after serving in the House of Representatives as Republican Counsel to the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Counsel and as Legislative Counsel to Virginia's Senator John Warner. While working for the Commerce Committee, John worked on issues as varied as the Oil Pollution Act of 1990, a review of the Shipping Act of 1984, cargo preference, the Jones Act, vessel safety and Coast Guard programs, the Magnuson Fisheries Conservation and Management Act, seafood safety and inspection, ocean driftnet legislation, the Coastal Zone Management Act, and the Marine Mammal Protection Act. John worked with Committee members from states as diverse as Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Alaska, Washington, Oregon, and Virginia. I always was impressed with John's knowledge and experience, and with is effort to make sure that the concerns of all of the Republican members of the Committee were understood and addressed.

John left the Commerce Committee in 1995, first working for the government and public affairs firm of Alcalde & Fay, and then for the American Waterways Operators, the trade association representing the United States tug, towboat, and barge industry. In 1998, Congress was nearing completion of the Ocean Shipping Reform Act of 1998 (OSRA). As I described it at the time, OSRA truly was a paradigm shift in the conduct of the ocean liner business and its regulations by the Federal Maritime Commission (FMC). Along with other members of the Commerce Committee who worked for over four years on OSRA, I wanted to ensure that there were Commissioners at the FMC who understood that Congress wanted to foster a more competitive and efficient ocean transport system by placing greater reliance on the marketplace. I thought of John and his interest and experience in maritime matters. John's experience and philosophy made him the right choice to help the FMC implement OSRA.

Confirmed by the Senate in October, 1998, John's efforts during the past three and a half years, especially his contributions during the FMC's rulemaking, helped establish the foundation making the paradigm shift possible. John worked closely with Chairman Harold Creel and the other commissioners, the staff of the FMC, the carriers, shippers, and transportation intermediaries to implement OSRA as Congress intended. I am pleased to report that, under the Commission's administration, the reforms are working much as Congress hoped. John should be proud of his work and the contribution he made during his tenure as a Commissioner.

I congratulate John for his exemplary career at the FMC and salute his contributions to the maritime industry. He is to be commended for the productive use of his insights and talents and appreciated for his years of public service. As he returns to private life, where he will continue working on the maritime issues he loves, I wish John, his wife Medina, and their two children fair winds and following seas.

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, section 314 of the Congressional Budget Act, as amended, requires the chairman of the Senate Budget Committee to make adjustments to budget resolution allocations and aggregates for amounts designated as emergency requirements pursuant to section 252(e) of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, as amended.

LOCAL LAW ENFORCEMENT ACT OF 2001

Mr. SMITH of Oregon. Mr. President, I rise today to speak about hate crimes legislation I introduced with Senator KENNEDY in March of last year. The Local Law Enforcement Act of 2001 would add new categories to current hate crimes legislation sending a signal that violence of any kind is unacceptable in our society.

I would like to describe a terrible crime that occurred in June 2000 in Rapid City, SD. Police were "baffled" by the lastest in a series of eight inexplicable drowning deaths among mostly Native Americans along Rapid Creek. Press reports indicate that local Native Americans believe an "Indian-hater" is waiting for the victims to become drunk and then dragging, rolling, or pushing them into the water. Those incidents came on the heels of a March 2000 report from the U.S. Civil Rights Commission showing that racial tensions in the state are high.

I believe that government's first duty is to defend its citizens, to defend them against the harms that come out of hate. The Local Law Enforcement Enhancement Act of 2001 is now a symbol that can become substance. I believe that by passing this legislation and changing current law, we can change hearts and minds as well.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

DEDICATION OF THE EISENHOWER EXECUTIVE OFFICE BUILDING

• Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, on Tuesday, May 7th, 2002, the Old Executive Office Building was renamed in honor of President Dwight D. Eisenhower. The dedication of the Dwight D. Eisenhower Executive Office Building was pursuant to legislation introduced by my late father, Senator John H. Chafee, on September 28, 1999 and signed into law by President Clinton on November 9, 1999. President George W. Bush, Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, General Service Administration Administrator Stephen A. Perry, Deputy Secretary of Defense Paul Wolfowitz, and Eisenhower Institute President Susan Eisenhower were present and delivered remarks at last Tuesday's ceremony. I ask that their remarks be printed in the RECORD.

The remarks follow:

REMARKS AT DEDICATION CEREMONY TO RENAME THE OLD EXECUTIVE OFFICE BUILDING IN HONOR OF PRESIDENT DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, MAY 7, 2002

REMARKS BY ADMINISTRATOR STEPHEN A. PERRY, U.S. GENERAL SERVICE ADMINISTRATION

Mr. President, Secretary Powell, Deputy Secretary Wolfowitz, Ms. Eisenhower and the Eisenhower Family, Distinguished Guests, Ladies and Gentlemen.

It is my privilege to welcome you today to the dedication and renaming of this building—the Eisenhower Executive Office Building. This magnificent structure is one of the most distinctive of the 400 historic properties in the inventory of the General Services Administration.

This building was commissioned by another renowned general and president—Ulysses S. Grant. It was designed by architect Alfred B. Mullett. The construction of this building was completed in 1888, and it was known originally as the State, War and Navy Building.

As might be expected of a building of this vintage and in this location it is steeped in history. Among other things, it has been the office for 16 Secretaries of the Navy, 21 Secretaries of War and 24 Secretaries of State. Seven future presidents had offices in the building before they eventually became occupants of the Oval Office—including, of course, Dwight D. Eisenhower.

This building's commanding presence in our Nation's capital serves to remind us of the commanding presence that President Eisenhower always had. He personified honor, dignity and integrity. The many medals that decorated his Army uniform signify that he was a great leader, a brilliant military strategist, a builder of alliances and a peacemaker.

As General Eisenhower and as President Eisenhower, he was a staunch defender of freedom—from the vast arena of world war to the classrooms of a local public high school in Little Rock, Arkansas. He was—and is—a genuine American hero and statesman.

Ladies and gentlemen, it is fitting that we honor President Eisenhower's life and legacy with the naming of this stately building. The Dwight D. Eisenhower Executive Office Building marks the spot of its namesake's rightful place in history here in Washington, DC, our nation's capital, and on Pennsylvania Avenue, America's Main Street.

Now I would like to introduce our next speaker. Dr. Paul Wolfowitz is our country's 28th Deputy Secretary of Defense. He was previously Dean and Professor of International Relations at the Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies of The Johns Hopkins University. His distinguished government career includes service as the Ambassador to Indonesia and Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs.

His current appointment marks his third tour of duty at the Pentagon. Ladies and gentlemen, please welcome Deputy Secretary of Defense, Paul Wolfowitz.

REMARKS BY DEPUTY SECRETARY OF DEFENSE PAUL WOLFOWITZ

President Bush; Secretary [of State] Powell; [GSA] Administrator Perry; Susan Eisenhower and members of the Eisenhower family; distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen.

It is an honor to be able to join you today in paying tribute to Dwight David Eisenhower-a man whose courage, dignity and character exemplified the spirit of that "Greatest Generation," which sacrificed so much to preserve peace and freedom for our generation and generations to come.

The windows of the Pentagon, where I work, frame a view of the Arlington hillsides where so many of those heroes sleep. Images of that great leader known as "Ike" line the Eisenhower Corridor just outside the Pentagon office of the Secretary of Defense. His is the first face—the face of the young cadet, the Supreme Allied Commander, the President of the United States—that many of us see on the start of our day and which sends us on our way each night.

Dwight Eisenhower's vision, determination and courage to change continues to inspire and serve as a model for us, Mr. President, as we carry out your instructions to transform America's Armed Forces and prepare for the new and different challenges of the 21st Century.

When Dwight David Eisenhower was still a young officer between the world wars, he and another young officer by the name of George Patton began writing about the future of armored warfare. He was called in by his commander and told if he published anything else contrary to "solid infantry doctrine," he would be court-martialed.

But Major Eisenhower persevered. Later, Supreme Allied Commander Dwight David Eisenhower put George Patton and the Third Army to work. The rest is history. The history of victory in Europe-victory over Nazi oppression—the foundation of a new and stable peace in Europe that has lasted more than half a century and led to the peaceful triumph in the Cold War.

Like all great leaders, Eisenhower had a sense of proportion about himself and a deep humility. Addressing the British Parliament, which honored him after the triumph of the Allied Forces, he said that he was merely a symbol—a symbol of the "great human forces that have labored arduously and successfully for a righteous cause."

Today, under the leadership of President George W. Bush, we are embarked on another righteous cause, and we remember the example of Eisenhower. We know, as he often told us, that the great fight for freedom did not end at the beaches named Omaha and Utah. It continues today. It continues within the walls of this building that we dedicated to him.

And for those who labor for freedom, let them find inspiration in this building's namesake, a man of responsibility and vision, one of freedom's greatest warriors and a great champion of peace.

That inspiration is the realization that doing great things requires more than detailed plans—though detailed plans there must be—it requires a great cause and great ideals and, above all, a sense of what is important in this world and the next. No one knew that better than Dwight Eisenhower.

There is a story that Eisenhower once went to buy a piece of land in Gettysburg and the local clerk said to him, "Well, President Eisenhower, you've done everything, you've lived everywhere, why would you want this little piece of land in Gettysburg?" He answered saying, "Sir, all my life I have wanted one time to be able to take a small piece of America and make it better."

He made America—all of America—better. And today, we dedicate a small piece of American to Dwight David Eisenhower. May all who work here work to make America better, as he did.

And may they remember, as he did, what matters in life. His last words were these: "I've always loved my wife, I've always loved my children. I've always loved my grandchildren. I've always loved my country."

Now it is my privilege to introduce another leader who loves his country deeply and has devoted his life to making America better, Secretary of State Colin Powell. You do doubt remember, Mr. President—when you announced the appointment of your Secretary of State at a school in Crawford—it was very moving for all of America to see another distinguished soldier, General Colin Powell, come into that office which is so important for the peace of the world.

I also remember when Colin said that he didn't "yet do ranch wear very well" since he was from the South Bronx. And many of us, especially those of us from back East, secretly agreed with him when he declared, "I don't care what you say. Those cows look dangerous."

Only a man of integrity and humility could admit that to America.

Those are qualities, along with statesmanship and true leadership, that he has brought to every position that he has held. And today the enjoys the gratitude of all Americans and so many others around the world—and I know your gratitude, Mr. President—for his courageous and tireless efforts, not only to make our country safer, but to make the world more peaceful.

I am proud to present to you a man of whom Dwight Eisenhower would be proud today—another soldier, statesman and leader—our Secretary of State, Colin Powell.

REMARKS BY SUSAN EISENHOWER, PRESIDENT, EISENHOWER INSTITUTE

Mr. President and First Lady. Secretary Powell. Secretary Wolfowitz. Honored guests, I was nervous about the weather this morning and when I looked out the window I was reminded of a similar day not long after my grandfather, Dwight Eisenhower, became President. He agreed to speak at Penn State where his brother was President of the University. When Milton called him frantically and asked him if they should move the outdoor proceedings inside, Ike brushed off his concerns, "It's up to you Milton," he said, "I haven't worried about the weather since June 6, 1944."

We have our minds on bigger things today and I think it is fitting that today we mark the renaming of the Old Executive Office Building to the Dwight D. Eisenhower Executive Office Building. Dwight Eisenhower spent more time in this building than any other man who became President, and during his term he saved it from the wrecking ball. But it is also fitting that we mark this occasion today as we celebrate Victory in Europe Day. Dwight Eisenhower and VE Day will be linked forever in our consciousness.

Yet our contemporary minds can barely grasp the significance of that day—57 years ago. Had the allies not been successful or if victory had eluded us longer the world would have turned out to be a very different place: one can imagine what the consequences would have been if Nazis had prevailed, but the world might have been radically different even if an allied victory had taken longer to secure. A nuclear bomb might have been used in Europe, for instance, or the liberation of the death camps might have come too late . . . .

June 12, 1945, a little more than one month after the end of the hostilities, Dwight Eisenhower stood on the balcony of London's Guildhall and accepted the freedom of the city and the London Sword. The killing had stopped, but the cost of the conflict had only begun to be measured.

Europe lay in utter ruins. Cities had been crushed, economies had collapsed and the carnage was beyond our comprehension. In the European theater, including Russia, 11½ million allied soldiers were killed in action and more than 7 million Allied civilians perished from starvation, bombing or butchery, and that is not counting those who were victims of the Holocaust.

Eisenhower had led a great military crusade to defeat Nazism and had decisively prevailed. Standing before the teeming London crowd that day Eisenhower began his acceptance speech solemnly, without a written text:

"The high sense of distinction I feel in receiving this great honor from the city of London is inescapably mingled with feelings of profound sadness," he said. ". . . Humility must always be the portion of any man who receives acclaim earned in blood of his followers and sacrifices of his friends."

In this speech—which he had written himself and memorized for the occasion—he accepted the tribute, acknowledging that he was but a symbol of great human forces that had "labored arduously and successfully for a righteous cause . . ."

He continued: "If all Allied men and women that have served with me in this war can only know that it is they whom this august body is really honoring today, then indeed I will be content."

In thinking about that occasion, I can imagine that if Dwight Eisenhower were with us today to accept this honor—he would, again deflect our praise of him onto those with whom he had served. He would have eloquent words for the team he'd assembled during the war and for the fighting men and women, and he would gratefully acknowledge the legions of dedicated public servants—on both sides of the aisle—with whom he worked closely during his presidency. He would acknowledge not only his staff but Congress as well, for helping him: shepherd America through the dangerous years of the Cold war; modernize America's infrastructure, that laid the groundwork for technological innovation; explore space through a civilian agency, NASA, that would be the envy of the world; and begin the long and arduous task of making Civil Rights every American's right.

If Dwight Eisenhower were here he would be right about the indispensable role played by the millions who answered their nation's call in war and at peace.

But Eisenhower is not here today, and so while we acknowledge those who served with him we focus, today, on this modest man and remember him—for his leadership, and for his steady, even, hand.

Though he did not believe in the Great Man theory of history he was a leader of leaders; a common man with an unwavering belief in putting the nation's welfare above partisan politics . . . in seeking out the obligations and responsibilities that go with good government . . .

It is a privilege for me to speak on behalf of the Eisenhower family in thanking the nation for this honor. We are indebted to Congress—to the late Senator Chafee and his bipartisan cosponsors who initiated the legislation to rename the building—to President Clinton for signing it into law, and to President Bush—for this wonderful rededication and for his presence here today.

Mr. President, today, you too, are facing a difficult moment in American history. Though different in nature from World War II, nonetheless, we recognize the enormity of the task that confronts you in finding a just solution to the complex domestic and international circumstances that have emerged in the aftermath of the terrible events of September 11.

As you face these challenges, it gives me great pleasure to know that you have Dwight Eisenhower right next door.

I hope that his name on this vital nerve center of White House operations will help another generation of public servants recommit themselves to nothing less than self-sacrifice, devotion to duty and the most profound sense of humility. These are the qualities that are called for in these dangerous and troubling times.

And now, it is my great honor to introduce the President of the United States, George W. Bush.

REMARKS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, GEORGE W. BUSH

Thank you very much. Please be seated. Well, thank you all very much. And thank you, Susan, for those kind words, and welcome.

On behalf of all Americans, I am proud to dedicate this historic building to the lasting memory of a great man, Dwight David Eisenhower.

I want to thank Secretary Powell and Deputy Secretary Wolfowitz, Administrator Perry, General Hicks, for their kind words. I'm also pleased to have so many special guests who are here. I don't see—I do see Senator Stevens. I'm so honored that Senator Ted Stevens, who actually worked in the Eisenhower administration, is here. And I want to welcome all the others who worked in this—in the Eisenhower administration to this dedication ceremony. Welcome.

I also want to welcome General Andrew Goodpaster, Senator Bob Dole, and all the other veterans of World War II. We're please to have you here. It's a pleasure to welcome back former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger. I want to thank members of the United States Congress—Senator Inouye, Congressman Amo Houghton, Jerry Moran, Jim Ryun, Congressman Steven Horn.

And I, too, want to say how much we appreciate the work of former Senator John Chafee, who introduced the legislation necessary to rename this bill—this building in honor of Dwight Eisenhower.

And above all, we welcome the Eisenhower family, and send our good wishes to John Eisenhower, who could not be with us today. As the son of a President, myself, I know how proud John must feel, knowing that our country's respect for his father has only increased with the years.

The city of Washington is accustomed to change. But this neighborhood looks much as it did in 1929. If you'd walked down Pennsylvania Avenue 73 years ago, you would have seen the Renwick Building on the corner of 17th Street, looking just as it does now. A few doors down were the Blair and Lee Houses, with gas lamps still out front.

In 1929, Lafayette Square was dominated by a great bronze horse, as it is today, proudly carrying Andrew Jackson. And standing outside this building on a spring morning 73 years ago, you might have seen Dwight Eisenhower pull up in a 1927 Buick and walk up the stairs to his office.

The '20s and '30s were quiet times for our Army and Navy, quiet times when he worked here. But it was in this building that Dwight Eisenhower's reputation began to grown. His immediate supervisor said of him this—said this of him: "This is the best officer in the Army. When the next war comes, he should go right to the top." These words carried a lot of weight; after all, the man who said them was Douglas MacArthur.

He also worked here for many years in Room 252. There was a time when a visitor to this building might pass in the hallway not only Eisenhower and MacArthur, but the first man commissioned General of the Armies of the United States, John J. Pershing. General Pershing occupied Room 274, a space now used by Vice president Dick Cheney.

Two doors down is an office that Theodore Roosevelt would still recognize as his own from his time as Assistant Secretary of the Navy. So would Franklin Roosevelt, who, a generation later, occupied the same office and walked these very same halls. And in between, from 1904 to 1908, William Howard Taft reported to work here as the Secretary of the War. In all, as has been mentioned, seven future Presidents have worked in this building; 25 Presidents have known it.

Harry S. Truman held press conferences in an ornate room two stories high, called the Indian Treaty Room—although, no Indian treaty has ever been signed there. And it was Truman, himself, who paid a distinctive tribute to this building when a committee suggested it be torn down. He believed we ought to leave it right here. He said, "It's the greatest monstrosity in America."

But it was Eisenhower who decided its fate. He said he rather liked it. And over time, a lot of us have come to like it. The architectural grace of this building will remain a matter of opinion, but its place in history and its place on the skyline of Washington is as safe as can be.

It seems odd that with all the history it contains, this great building went more than a century without a name befitting its dignity. We've solved that problem today, and we've solved it once and for all. This building now bears the name of Dwight D. Eisenhower, not because it was spared from the wrecking ball in his time; not even because he was the first President born in Texas. (Laughter.) His name fits this building because, as a great soldier, a great President, and a good man, Dwight D. Eisenhower served his country with distinction.

People over a certain age will always associate Dwight Eisenhower with a time of strength and a time of stability in America. We think of the '50s, and in the mind's eye we see the President and his fine wife, Mamie. They had lived a military life, moving more than 30 times. And just as GIs in the '50s across America were settling back home, so were the Eisenhowers. As a matter of fact, they would live longer in the White House here than at any other address.

We don't need to idolize the era they represented to see all the good things that were there: millions of growing families and industries and new cities, and the beginnings of the life that we know today.

Had he never become President, Eisenhower would still be known to all as the leader of the forces that liberated a continent from a terrible evil. The turning point of the war was the decision to invade the coast of France. The decision was made by Roosevelt and Churchill; the day and hour were left to General Eisenhower. And a lot of people felt a lot better knowing that it was his call to make.

General Eisenhower understood exactly what risks lay ahead. Had his troops failed to take the beaches, he was going to point a finger straight at himself. Here's what he wrote, in advance: "If any blame or fault attaches to the attempt, it is mine alone." Fifty-seven years ago this very day, General Eisenhower reported that the mission of the Allied Force was fulfilled, and the war in Europe was over.

In victory, he was the first to share credit. It was not within his character to do otherwise. As Vice President, Richard Nixon said this about General Eisenhower, President Eisenhower: "He always retained a saving humility." "It was the humility," Nixon said, "not of fear, but of confidence. He walked with the greats of the world, and he knew that the greats are human. His was the humility of man before God, and before the truth. His was the humility of a man too proud to be arrogant."

In his career, Dwight Eisenhower faced two great crises of the 20th century: a World War that came upon America with a sudden attack, requiring a global response, and a Cold War that tested our patience and resolve to wage a struggle of decades.

In our time, we face elements of both: an enemy that strikes suddenly, and must be pursued across the years. And in this struggle, we know how victory will be gained, because President Eisenhower—and General Eisenhower—showed us the way. We will be calm, and confident, and relentless. With the best of America's character, we will defeat America's enemies.

We are proceeding with patience and resolve to overcome this growing danger to the civilized world. NATO, the grand alliance first commanded by General Eisenhower, is part of a new coalition that is making steady progress on every front. Our mission in Afghanistan continues even after we have liberated that country from a brutal regime. We continue to fight al Qaeda terrorists, and we will prevent them from regrouping elsewhere.

We'll deny terrorists the safe havens they need to operate, and choke off their sources of money and supplies. We'll confront dangerous regimes that seek weapons of mass destruction. In this war, we will depend on the alertness of our law enforcement, the diligence of our intelligence operations, and on the skill and valor of the American Armed Forces.

Our military has performed with great daring and courage, and more will be asked of them. I have full confidence, complete confidence, in the men and women who wear our uniform. They've responded in the finest tradition of the American military. Their sense of honor, their devotion to duty, their loyal service to America would all be recognized by the five-star general and President we remember today. The skill and determination and optimism of Dwight Eisenhower are alive in the American Armed Forces, and that spirit will bring us to victory.

The General was one of six sons raised by Ida and David Eisenhower in the prairie town of Abilene, Kansas. They raised good men, but destiny chose this one. His whole life shows the power of one man's goodness and integrity to shape great events. He brought permanent honor to his family name, and that name now brings honor to this grand building. It's one more mark of this country's respect, and we offer it today with great affection, and lasting gratitude.

God bless.

REMARKS BY COLIN L. POWELL, SECRETARY OF STATE

Well, thank you very much, ladies and gentlemen. Paul, I thank you for that most kind of generous introduction. And I was down at Crawford, Texas, just week before last. The cows still look bad to me. I'm not ready to do it. (Laughter.)

Mr. President, Administrator Perry, Mr. Eisenhower, the members of the Eisenhower family, distinguished guests, it's a great pleasure to be here today and join you in celebrating the naming of this wonderful, marvelous old building after one of America's greatest heroes, Dwight David Eisenhower—liberator of Europe, first steward of NATO, builder of peace. Rare in history has there been an individual of higher accomplishment and greater humility.

President Eisenhower used to say praise is like perfume; it's fine if you don't swallow it. What he did was never for himself. It was for his country. It was always for us.

President Eisenhower has always had a special place in my heart. In June of 1958, he signed the document that commissioned me as a Second Lieutenant of Infantry in the United States Army and started me on my career of service to the nation.

Paul made mention of the corridor that exists outside of Secretary Rumsfeld's office which has all these wonderful displays of Eisenhower's life, from the early days through his last days. I'll never forget that last display where he talked about his love of family, love of wife, love of grandchildren and love of country. It always has a special place in my heart because I designed that corridor. I helped build it some 15-odd years ago. But I never go to that corridor and I never walk through this building without having a new sense of service, a renewed inspiration that comes into my heart as a result of my knowledge of Dwight David Eisenhower and his contribution to our nation.

More important than all of these things, more important than his signature on my commission or the naming of a building after him, is the example that he gives to us of commitment to duty, of commitment to country. It was his model of devoted service that persuaded me and so many others of my generation in the military to remain in the military after Vietnam, when things were at their darkest. We knew how vitally important it would be for the future security of the nation to rebuild, to transform our armed forces in the early '70s.

And Eisenhower labored without fame, without fortune or fanfare, in similar circumstances in an under-supported and under-valued army in the isolationist decades before World War II. He spent a good many of those years working in this very structure, when it was called the State, War and Navy Building. All three departments had been housed here from the 1870's. The State Department thrived in this building between 1875 and 1947, when we moved to our present location. Twenty-five Secretaries of State had their offices here. We have a historical difference between Mr. Perry and I as to whether there is 24 or 25, but we'll make that count accurate in the next hour or so.

Hamilton Fish, Ulysses S. Grant's Secretary of State, was the first. Secretary Fish helped create a professional diplomatic corps. And the last Secretary of State here was the legendary George Catlett Marshall, for whom the plan for Europe's recovery is named. During World War II, he also served in this building as Chief of Staff of the United States Army.

General Marshall was so impressed by Eisenhower's skills as a strategist and statesman that he selflessly agreed with President Roosevelt that Eisenhower should lead the Allied invasion of Europe. Fighting Nazi Germany was only a part of General Eisenhower's job as Supreme Commander. Eisenhower was a brilliant forger of alliances. He was a master at using the full range of diplomatic, political and economic tools to win the war, and also to win the peace.

He once wrote to his devoted and loving wife Mamie that to run the coalition meant that he had to be a bit of a diplomatic, a lawyer, a salesman, a socialite, and incidentally a soldier. His words rang true for me during the Gulf War, and they are true for all of us who are today involved in sustaining, under President Bush's leadership, the global coalition against terrorism.

President Eisenhower's name on this building will inspire all who serve under its massive roof now, and all those who will follow. Despite his well known modesty, I think it would please Dwight Eisenhower that this fine old edifice, which has seen so much history, has been named in his honor.

Dwight Eisenhower was a great student of history long before he helped make it, and he passed down his love of history and his commitment to public service to new generations of his family. They have given so much to our country as historians, military officers, diplomats and philanthropists. Indeed, to be an Eisenhower is to have a sense of history and a sense of duty to your country and to our world.

It is with great pleasure, then, that I introduce our next guest speaker, a person who would make Eisenhower very proud—not just because of who she is as a granddaughter, but also because of what she contributed to our country and the world. Susan Eisenhower not only has her grandfather's winning smile, but his extraordinary gift of insight, that remarkable ability to see what others do not.

She understood more quickly than most just how much the world changed with the end of the Soviet Union and the emergence of Russia and the other Newly Independent States. With her characteristic energy and drive, she has repeatedly pulled together the best experts from around the globe to open our eyes to what is happening in that vast region, and to think about it in fresh, exciting, new ways.

And Susan has not been content just to describe change. She has been a force for change. Among her many activities, one that means a great deal to me is to help bring new generations of Russian leaders here on visits so they can learn from us and we can learn from them.

The understanding and friendships that come out of these exchanges are laying the enduring foundation for a mutually beneficial US-Russian relationship. Susan is helping build a powerful legacy that Dwight Eisenhower would recognize, appreciate and welcome.

So ladies and gentlemen, it is now my honor and privilege to present to you a friend, a person of enormous gifts and endless dedication, Susan Eisenhower.●

THE HONORABLE ALVIN BROOKS, KANSAS CITY, MO, MAYOR PRO TEM AND CITY COUNCILMAN AT-LARGE, 6TH DISTRICT

● Mrs. CARNAHAN. Mr. President, I wish to take this opportunity to honor and recognize an outstanding gentleman, Mr. Alvin Brooks, on his 70th birthday. Mr. Brooks, Kansas City, MO, Mayor Pro Tem and 6th District at-large City Councilman, is truly extraordinary. His fifty years of tireless commitment to public service in Kansas City, devotion to community activism, civic participation, and youth advocacy are an inspiration to us all.

Mr. Brooks was elected to serve as the 6th District at-large Councilman in 1999. After his election, Mayor Kay Barnes appointed Brooks as Mayor Pro

Tem. In addition to serving as Mayor Pro Tem, he is vice chair of the Legislative, Rules and Ethics Committee, a member of the Finance and Audit Committee, and chair of the Public Facilities and Safety Committee.

In 1991, Brooks was selected as President of the Ad Hoc Group Against Crime, a grassroots community organization he founded in 1977. Former President George Bush honored Brooks in November 1989 for his work with the Ad Hoc Group Against Crime and named him one of America's 1,000 Points of Light. President Bush also appointed him to a three-year term on the President's National Drug Advisory Council. Former Drug Czar William Bennett recognized Brooks as being one of the nation's "front-line soldiers in our war against drugs."

Prior to serving as President of the Ad Hoc Group Against Crime, Alvin Brooks already had a distinguished career in public service. He was a Kansas City, MO police officer for 10 years, where he held the rank of detective. During that time, Alvin worked extensively with runaways and gang members, demonstrating his commitment to improving social conditions for young people, especially inner-city youth. He also served as assistant city manager for seven years and was the first African American to serve as a department head for the city of Kansas City, MO.

Though it is possible to list Alvin Brooks' professional accomplishments, it is impossible to measure the immense impact this man has had, and continues to have, in Kansas City. He has touched and improved the lives of countless Kansas Citians. His voice can still be heard on the radio urging community action, not as Mayor Pro Tem, but as the respected community elder whose commitment to others is unquestioned. He is truly the voice of moral authority in Kansas City.

I commend Mr. Alvin Brooks for his selfless dedication to the improvement of Kansas City and wish him all the best on his 70th Birthday. Kansas City is certainly fortunate to have such a dedicated public servant. On behalf of all those you have served, Alvin, I thank you.•

COMMEMORATING THE CHERRY BLOSSOM TEN MILE RUN

• Mr. FRIST. Mr. President, I rise today to commemorate the running of the Credit Union Cherry Blossom Ten Mile Run on April 7, 2002. Fifty-eight credit unions, credit union associations, and credit union leagues sponsored this Washington, DC institution, which coincides with the annual spring rites of the tidal basin cherry blossoms. This is the first year that Credit Unions have sponsored the race.

I want to commend the over 7,032 finishers, and especially the over 3,500 registered runners who were members of credit unions. A special congratulations to Public Health Service Federal Credit Union for winning the credit union team competition. Additionally, I am proud of 350 plus credit union employees who arrived at the race in the chilly, pre-dawn hours to serve as volunteers helping administer the race. It was also great to see Health and Human Services Secretary Tommy Thompson participate.

The Cherry Blossom Run has taken place during the spring blooming of Washington's historic cherry trees for 30 years. Starting out as a small family event with 141 finishers it is now a world-class event that includes some of the world's foremost long distance runners. I want to congratulate this year's winners: Men's, Rueben Cheruiyot, 47:12; Women's, Luminita Talpos, 52:50.

This year, in conjunction with the race, credit unions raised over $60,000 for the Children's Miracle Network and donations are still being collected. This was a great event and credit unions should be proud of the role they played. Washingtonians and runners around the world are looking forward to the 2003 Credit Union Cherry Blossom 10 Mile run.•

DEVELOPING NEW MEDICINES

• Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I rise today to call the attention of my colleagues in the Senate to an article that appeared in the Wall Street Journal on May 2 which provides an important perspective on the challenging and vital process of developing new medicines. It is no coincidence that the article features Pfizer Inc., a world leader in pharmaceuticals and a company that made its home in my home State of Connecticut. Pfizer's contribution to changing the quality of health care by developing new therapies for conditions such as epilepsy, depression, arthritis, high blood pressure and more has been invaluable. This sort of innovation has increased the quality of care we deliver as well as changed the nature of it, with new medicines resulting in fewer trips to hospitals, doctor's offices, and better overall care for so many patients.

The article details the company's efforts, ultimately unsuccessful, to discover, develop and test a new medicine to strengthen muscle, thereby helping to prevent injury and possibly osteoporosis in the elderly. In the process, Pfizer committed a team of scientists, $71 million, and 10 years of effort, and this was before the development process even progressed to advanced clinical trials, underscoring the tremendous investment required in developing each new therapy. Despite this infusion of resources and time, the project ultimately failed to produce the desired therapy. But the accounting of this process is an excellent example of the risks, costs and efforts involved in innovation.

We must continue to recognize and support these research and development efforts because we know the value they can provide. As we work in this Congress, and we must, to expand coverage and increase access to new medicines, we should strive to craft policy that continues to encourage the development of innovative products that can change and even save lives while helping to ensure that all our citizens benefit from such innovation.

I ask that this article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows.

DRUG PRICES—WHY THEY KEEP SOARING—BLEEDING CASH: PFIZER 'YOUTH PILL' . . .

THE WALL STREET JOURNAL VIA DOW JONES

About a sixth of Pfizer's portfolio of drugs in development were approved by Dr. Clark and his colleagues, including the frailty drugs, which got the green light in December 1995. He was confident the frailty compound would succeed, ranking it among the top third of candidates at the time.

But even among the fortunate drugs that pass muster initially with Dr. Clark's committee, the odds remain stacked against their ever making it to market. Dr. Clark's group also guides the researchers, funds interim studies and establishes milestones for judgment. And at any point Dr. Clark's committee can kill the very projects it has approved. Last year, the committee terminated research on five of seven promising medicines it had previously "canned."

The growth-hormone project quickly surpassed all the researchers' expectations. From the time the project was canned, it took only nine months to develop a drug that was safe enough to test in humans—a speed record for the research center in Groton, Conn., across the river from administrative headquarters in New London. The drug "had no bumps or warts," marveled Gordon Gruetzmacher, project manager for the frailty drug.

Though increasingly optimistic, Pfizer scientists and managers were sober about the challenges the potential new medicine faced—especially the elusive nature of the condition it was intended to treat. Frailty, which they came to define as an "age-related decline in physical performance," wasn't a recognized disease, like osteoporosis or Alzheimer's.

A drug to treat the chronic condition, like many the industry is now tackling, would require lengthy and especially expensive clinical studies because its effects might be subtle and take months or years to understand. To make sure that an experimental drug deserves such a sizable investment, Pfizer blends marketing with R&D early on. A marketing specialist works with each drug team to ascertain commercial merit. In particular, will the drug meet a compelling unmet medical need and will Pfizer be able to differentiate its medicines from those of its competitors?

For the frailty drug, researchers believed they would have to show that it could do more than boost hormone levels or even muscle growth. Early talks with the Food and Drug Administration confirmed the higher standard. Insurers, too, would need evidence that the frailty drug would be worth their expense.

To persuade regulators and insurers to embrace the drug, the Pfizer team aimed to prove beyond a doubt that elderly people who took it could walk faster and longer and avoid the kinds of falls that force many of them into nursing homes.

Such a drug also could appeal to a younger, healthier but worried market, people who might use the medicine as a lifestyle enhancer, like Viagra, decades before they faced a real danger of frailty. For Pfizer, a medicine to stave off the ravages of old age, unlike an antibiotic taken for a week, could provide a long-term revenue stream: "People will take it for 20 or 30 years—it'll be like a vitamin," predicted John LaMattina, a senior research executive, early last year.

In late 1996, the frailty drug hit its first setback when an otherwise healthy man participating in a small safety study in the Netherlands developed a mysterious, mild rash. The test was halted while the team investigated. The cause was never found, though the leading theory remains that he had a reaction to laundry detergent or hand soap. After a few months, the team concluded that the drug was safe enough to continue.

Pfizer recognized the growth-hormone workers as the best research team of 1996 for their trail-blazing accomplishments. And they continued on the fast track, initiating in late 1997 a larger clinical test of the drug, involving 114 people who randomly received one of four different doses or a placebo for a month. At this stage, the researchers sought to substantiate the safety of the drug and to pinpoint the best dose to use in subsequent tests of effectiveness.

To their happy surprise, the scientists found that even a one-month regimen with the experimental drug produced measurable growth of muscle. "It was great," Dr. Gruetzmacher recalls, "We didn't expect an increase in less than six months."

Though encouraging, the results didn't prove the drug was working. The test could have been a fluke. Besides, increases in muscle mass, even if they were real, wouldn't convince regulators to approve the drug, everyone had previously agreed. After lengthy discussion, the team decided to propose a six-month trial of the drug to Dr. Clark and his committee for approval and funding.

But the scientists realized that showing that the drug halted or reversed aging would take months or even years. Dr. Clark pushed the research team to reconsider its time frame and "go for the home run" by pursuing a longer and much more expensive test that could detect subtle improvements in patients' ability to function.

The team took six months to design a trial that would provide a definitive answer on whether the drug worked. They eventually proposed a two-year study in elderly patients that would measure muscle and some biochemical markers in the bloodstream. They also would test the subjects' walking speed and endurance and their ability to get in and out of a chair.

Dr. Clark's management committee agreed to fund the study in about 350 patients, much larger than usual for such an early stage. To hedge the outsize bet and ensure that the project was on track, the study included interim analyses at six and 12 months.

Last summer, three senior managers unconnected to the project, including a statistician, were chosen to review the data after six months. As outsiders, they were expected to be unbiased, and they would share their findings with only a few senior managers.

In less than a week, they had reached their conclusion and called Dr. Clark. He decided to break the secrecy and inform the research team of the news.

The patients taking the frailty drug had gained some muscle mass—but less than 3% more than the placebo group, which had also experienced muscle increases. There were no safety problems with the drug. But the study was stopped within a month because the drug appeared ineffective.

Nobody is quite sure why. One theory is that the patients selected for the study may have been too healthy, so there was less room for improvement in the treated group. Another idea is that the drug caused the pituitary gland to release growth hormone in a way that was out of tune with the body's system for using it.

In the end, Dr. Clark's committee "took pity on us," Dr. Landshulz says, and allowed the team one last chance to salvage the medicine. They were permitted to collect and analyze data on the group of early patients in the study who had taken the drug for a year—just in case its effectiveness emerged later than six months.

That was a long shot, everyone agreed, but worth the modest incremental expense. The final analysis was completed this spring, and the results were the same.

Later this month, Dr. Clark's committee will review the file one last time and officially lay to rest the frailty drug, which Pfizer says cost the company $71 million to research and develop.

APPRECIATION FOR THE SONG, "WE UNITE," BY MS. BECKY COLE

● Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I am pleased to share with my colleagues in the Senate and the American people the song, "We Unite," by Becky Cole. The strength and patriotism of Americans following the September 11 attacks inspired her to write and record this song. It captures our citizens' love for their country, its ideals, and its liberties. For me, this song is a reminder of those who are working to rebuild the buildings that were destroyed and reverse the economic consequences of that terrible day. It reminds me of the victims and their families' courage to carry on and live. This song also reminds me of our service men and women around the world who are defending our Nation.

I ask to print in the RECORD the lyrics to Ms. Cole's song.

The material follows:

A NATIONAL ANTHEM "WE UNITE"

(Words and Music by Becky Cole)

From the depths of the graves we come now as one,
Yielding our lives to an unselfish love.
To expose that which is evil, to remove that which is dark,
To lift up our flag as others burn and tear it apart.

We will fight for justice,
We will risk our lives for love,
We'll rebuild America, with hope we'll stand as one.
To the mighty God above us, we salute and pray,
As one nation under God, we unite our lives today.

Though the winds and the waves have swept across our land,
Causing us to question the beliefs on which we stand.
But now, we're a new nation, under the red, white and blue,
A flag that stands for freedom and waves for me and you.●

TEACHER MAURICE LARUE RETIRES FROM STURGIS HIGH SCHOOL

● Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I rise today to recognize and honor Maurice (Maury) LaRue on the occasion of his retirement as a teacher in the Meade County School District in South Dakota.

By the end of May, Maury LaRue will have completed 33 years in the teaching profession, all at Sturgis High School. Upon graduation with a bachelor of science degree in education from the University of North Dakota, LaRue accepted a position as teacher and debate coach at Sturgis in 1969.

His teaching career has ranged from social studies and literature to vocational broadcasting and forensics. There has always been a strong emphasis on communication skills for LaRue. For 20 years, he was one of South Dakota's most respected and successful debate coaches. His debaters won numerous local, state, regional and national forensic honors. And while his students performed well in competition, the true measure of Maury's ability to build and improve the communication skills of his students, came in the number who went on to become successful community leaders, business leaders, attorneys, senior political staff as well as students who were able to think and communicate in their daily lives as adults, thanks to Maury's dedicated teaching style.

In addition to his many years as teacher and debate coach, Maury also coached cross-country and track for several years and is retiring as the director of the social studies department at Brown High School in Sturgis. He has served as a city council member for the City of Sturgis and has maintained a strong interest in community affairs and city, county and state government. He has performed technical direction for the South Dakota State Junior Miss program since 1970, and currently serves as the technical advisor for the Sturgis Community Center Theater. He is a member of the Sturgis Chamber of Commerce, serving on several committees, and is a member of the Fort

Meade Museum Board, the Sturgis Area Arts Council and is very active as an elder, choir member and leader with the Presbyterian Church. For the past dozen years, he has also owned and operated a successful photographic studio and gallery in Sturgis and most recently, he has become a volunteer fireman and earned the credentials as information officer. If there were any time left in the day, he would find time to fill it and provide counsel to his students or provide service to his community.

I have met Maury several times during my visits to Sturgis High School and the community of Sturgis. He is definitely a mover and shaker in the community of Sturgis and is very well-respected by both current students and alumni for his skills and abilities as an instructor and for the way he has shaped the lives and futures of those he has tutored over three decades. He is very focused and knowledgeable of local, state and federal politics and issues.

On the occasion of his retirement as a public school educator, I want to congratulate Maurice LaRue for his tireless dedication to his students, his commitment to finding the best in his students and for helping his students to 'communicate' with the world. I also want to commend him for his valuable service to his community over the years. Instead of hiding behind a textbook or staying at the chalkboard, Maurice LaRue has provided his many students over the years with his own example of being active in school and community. He has motivated the lives of many students and many of them would point to Maury as playing a pivotal role in their lives. Can there be any better reward for 33 years of dedicated teaching and community service!

I wish Maurice LaRue the best on his retirement.●

IN HONOR OF ENTERTAINER AND COMMUNITY LEADER PAT BOONE

● Mr. FRIST. Mr. President, the name Pat Boone rings synonymous with musical success. Pat has registered 60 songs on the musical charts with eighteen reaching the Top Ten and six reaching Number One. His recording career has spanned five decades—from the 1950s to the 1990s—and compilation albums are reaching a new generation of fans in the 21st century. Indeed, few entertainers can claim a more sustained career of success than Pat Boone.

Pat's success has even extended beyond music. He starred in fifteen films for 20th Century Fox. He hosted two weekly television variety shows—the Pat Boone Chevy Showroom and the Pat Boone Show. He has been a constant presence on radio both as a musician and as a show host. He has also found time to write several books about teenage life and, more recently, religion and family.

Pat donated all proceeds from his first book—Twixt Twelve and Twenty—to the Northeastern Institute of Christian Education. This was a sign of good things to come. Throughout his career, Pat Boone has generously given his support to countless charitable organizations. Perhaps most notably, he has served as spokesman, national chairman, and host of the Easter Seal Society Telethon for almost two decades.

Though Pat has attained worldwide fame, he has never forgotten his Tennessee roots. This is especially true for his charity work on behalf of Bethel Bible Village. For the last 25 years, Pat has been the celebrity host of the Bethel Bible Village Spectacular Golf Tournament. He has helped raise more than $1.3 billion for Bethel and bring it national recognition as a premier facility for the care of troubled and at-risk children.

Pat Boone is one of the most successful entertainers of our time; he's also one of the most caring and compassionate community leaders in America today. Pat has always put community first—whether it's the close-knit community of his family or the broader community of charitable organizations. I offer this statement to Pat Boone in recognition of a career of success and gratitude for a life of giving.●

RECOGNIZING ASIAN PACIFIC AMERICAN HERITAGE MONTH

● Mr. DAYTON. Mr. President, I rise today in honor of Asian Pacific American Heritage Month. In recent years, Americans have experienced an energizing infusion of Asian-based culture, which resonates in diverse folkways, cuisine, art forms, and religious beliefs and practices. In all these areas, I believe Minnesota is especially privileged, thanks to Asian American citizens who present a unique, vigorous dimension, both established and emerging. Therefore, I would like to highlight the ways that Asian Pacific Americans in particular have enriched our state.

We who make Minnesota our home truly comprise an international community. The Asian Pacific American presence in my state dates from the late nineteenth century, when Chinese, Japanese, and Filipino settlers first arrived. Today, many more groups, such as the Koreans, Asian Indians, Tibetans, Hmong, Vietnamese, and Cambodians, have augmented Minnesota's Asian Pacific community. This growth is ongoing, and I am pleased to say that in my state, the Asian Pacific American population increased over 100 percent in the last decade. Furthermore, the City of Saint Paul is distinguished by the largest Hmong population in the nation.

The Asian Pacific population has significantly contributed to the economic, social, and political fabric of Minnesota. In the Twin Cities of Saint Paul and Minneapolis, Asian entrepreneurs have succeeded in re-establishing key business districts in areas once dormant, leading to the revitalization of entire neighborhoods. These Americans have further invested in Minnesota through unprecedented rates of home ownership. In greater Minnesota, Asian Pacific Americans are also being welcomed. For example, Warroad, Minnesota, always a notable breeding ground for great hockey players, is now also home to a small but vibrant Lao population. Moreover, I am very proud to say that Minnesota has elected our nation's first Hmong legislator, State Senator Mee Moua.

The State Council on Asian-Pacific Minnesotans has chosen five individuals or groups who have made especially worthy contributions, and I would like to acknowledge these remarkable award winners.

Joseph Hui, who has resided in Minnesota for 30 years, has built a successful business career, but, more importantly, he has given back generously through community service and philanthropy. He was one of the founders of the Asian Pacific Endowment for Community Development, a fund directed and operated by Asian Americans. The fund encourages different Asian Pacific communities to work together in providing social, health, educational, economic, and cultural services. Thus far, the fund has given approximately $300,000 in grant money to more than 60 organizations.

Rita Mitra Mustaphi, a renowned choreographer, dancer, and educator, introduced the classical Indian dance form, Kathak, to Minnesota. She uses this 2000-year-old form of storytelling, essentially dance-poems, to explore bold, contemporary themes. She is the founder and Artistic Director of the Kathak Dance Theatre, which is the only professional dance theater of its kind in the Midwest. The theater received a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts to create and perform a new dance theater piece.

Another artistic innovator, Rick Shiomi, is a leading Asian American artist. He is the founder of Mu Daiko, a taiko drumming troop, and the Artistic Director of Theater Mu, a group primarily cultivating new Minnesota playwrights and Asian American actors. Blending ancient artistic forms, traditions, and stories with contemporary ones, these performers are dedicated to the ideal of theater as a total sensory experience. Their unique work reaches new audiences through Theater Mu's annual festival and outreach performances at schools, corporate sites, and community organizations.

The radio station KFAI, Fresh Air Radio, serving the Twin Cities since 1973, provides training opportunities in broadcasting to those who might lack the resources for formal training. Many of the station's volunteer programmers have recently arrived in the United States and, therefore, have the opportunity to broadcast in their native languages. Cultivating listeners not often served by traditional media, KFAI includes in its programming broadcasts which cater to the Indian, Khmer, Hmong, Vietnamese, and Filipino communities.

Finally, I would like to make special mention of a courageous woman, Darina Siv. Until her death in March at the early age of 44, Ms. Siv was dedicated to helping low-income Cambodians, whom she served first as a social worker, then as executive director of the United Cambodian Association of Minnesota. Her book, Never Come Back: A Cambodian Woman's Journey, described her personal hardships after the Khmer Rouge took control in her native Cambodia. In America, she became a tireless advocate and was instrumental in securing state legislation that helps foreign-born social workers overcome license barriers.

During Asian Pacific American month, I am happy to recognize the many ways—exciting, dynamic, complex, and subtle in which Asian Pacific Americans are making Minnesota a better, stronger, and richer place to live and work. It is important today and throughout the year, to celebrate these contributions.•

TRIBUTE TO MR. KENNETH OTAGAKI AND HIS FAMILY

• Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I am deeply honored to rise in tribute to Ken Otagaki, who is a very dear friend of mine. He is a patriot in the fullest sense of the word. His life and his service to our Nation should make all of us very proud to call him a fellow American. His story should inspire you. I ask to print in the RECORD an article about him and his family printed in the April 28, 2002, edition of the Honolulu Star-Bulletin in Hawaii.

The article follows.

LOVING PERSISTENCE PAYS OFF FOR OTAGAKIS

(By Treena Shapiro)

Members of the Otagaki family say that their patriarch has never let obstacles defeat him.

And as his children note, Kenneth Otagaki has faced challenges that would have discouraged a lesser man—from supporting himself while still a child, to wooing a reluctant bride, to learning to cope with a disability after World War II, to raising five children—eventually earning his Ph.D. and becoming a member of Gov. John Burns' cabinet.

Even at 84, "He's full of energy for someone who could have just sat around and said, 'I can't do this, I can't do that,'" said his daughter, Joy Miyashiro, 55.

Consequently, while growing up, the Otagaki children never wanted for anything, but had a lot to live up to.

Ken Otagaki took control of his life at the age of 12, his son Robin Otagaki said.

He was the second son of a Big Island field laborer and his picture bride wife. Because Japanese tradition at the time dictated that the first-born son inherit everything, Ken ran away to Honolulu at age 12 and worked as a houseboy, then put himself through college.

At the University of Hawaii in 1936, Ken met Janet, his bride-to-be. He was majoring in agriculture, she was majoring in home economics.

When Ken first asked Janet on a date, she tried to fix him up with a friend instead. "And the next time he asked me, I gave him the brush off because I'm not interested in him since I had a boyfriend," Janet said.

Eventually she consented to a date, "but I wasn't very much interested."

But Ken was more fun that her boyfriend, and more persistent, she said. "I tried to brush him off, but he just wouldn't. This is what he said: 'If I see a good one, why should I stop? I'm going to keep chasing you,'" she remembered.

After the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, Ken enlisted and joined the famed 100th Infantry Division. He proposed to Janet before being sent overseas and they decided to wait until he returned to get married.

Ken became a litter bearer, once helping an injured Spark Matsunaga down from the mountains.

In January 1944, near the hills of Cassino, Italy, Ken and six other litter bearers were called upon to help soldiers in front of them.

It was about 10 p.m. and snowing, Ken recalled.

"The Germans saw us coming, I suppose, so they threw a barrage of mortar shells. Unfortunately, one landed about three feet away from where we were, backed up against a big rock," he said.

Of the eight American soldiers in the group, one escaped injury. Three were killed and four, including Ken, were wounded seriously.

It was 20 hours before Ken was evacuated. The battle cost him his right leg, two fingers on his right hand and the sight in his right eye.

He wrote to Janet, telling her about his injuries and absolving her of her commitment to marry him, Joy said.

However, "She figured that he wasn't going to sit around and feel sorry for himself," Joy said. They were married later that year.

Robin said Ken's injuries interfered with his plans to become a medical doctor, then he was told he could not practice veterinary medicine, either. He ended up using his G.I. Bill to attend graduate school in Iowa and California, earning a doctorate in animal science.

Joy, who was born in Iowa, said her father's career took the family to Berkely and Davis, Calif., while her mother stayed home and raised five children that all came within one or two years of each other.

When Joy was 8, the family moved back to Hawaii, where her father taught at the University of Hawaii and later led the state Department of Agriculture during the Burns administration.

Joy said her father was always a good example for the kids.

"Even though he was physically challenged, he taught us how to ride bicycles, he taught us how to swim. If there was ripe mango up on the tree he would go up and get it," she said, adding that he kept his tree-climbing a secret from her mother.

"My mom really never worked, she did some substitute teaching, but she never really had to go out (and work)," Miyashiro said. "She always had Sunday dinners cooked for us, she sewed, she entertained, she was den mother, brownie leader."

She was also the family peacekeeper, according to Robin.

"My mother always had to be the one who was the mediator. She had to buffer the father from the children and the children from the father," he said.

His father had high expectations of his children, particularly in school, he said.

But Robin, who now teaches secondary science at Punahou, said the children were never academically inclined. In fact, he graduated last in his class from the University Lab School.

He and his late brother were the only Otagaki children who finished college.

These days, however, Robin, 52, and his wife live in the Manoa home he was raised in, while Ken and Janet live in a cottage on the same property and they all get on "tremendously," Robin said, describing how he and his father putter around the garden together.

"Little by little we meet in the middle," he said. "He has seen what I have become, and I realize where he has come from."

Both Joy and Robin noted how their father dotes on his eight grandchildren.

Ken said the key to raising his family has been respect: "Like any family, all-in-all, it requires a lot of understanding, a lot of give and take."•

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. KENNEDY (for himself, Mr. REED, and Mr. BINGAMAN):

S. 2508. A bill to preserve the effectiveness of medically important antibiotics by restricting their use as additives to animal feed; to the Committee on Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, it is with great pleasure that I join my distinguished colleagues, Senator JACK REED and Senator JEFF BINGAMAN, in introducing "The Preservation of Antibiotics for Human Treatment Act of 2002." This important legislation will protect the health of millions of Americans by preserving the effectiveness of antibiotics.

We rely on antibiotics to protect our health from deadly infections and to help safeguard the nation's security from the threat of bioterrorism. Yet we are squandering the effectiveness of these precious medications by using them indiscriminately as additives to animal feed.

Study after study has shown that the practice of using antibiotics to promote growth and fatten livestock erodes the effectiveness of these important pharmaceuticals. Mounting scientific evidence shows that this nontherapeutic use of antibiotics in agricultural animals can lead to development of antibiotic-resistant bacteria that can be transferred to people, making it harder to treat dangerous infections.

In July 1998, the National Academy of Sciences, in a report prepared at the request of the United States Department of Agriculture and the Food and Drug Administration, concluded "there is a link between the use of antibiotics in food animals, the development of bacterial resistance to these drugs, and human disease." In 1997 and again in 2000, the World Health Organization recommended that antibiotics used to treat humans should not also be used to promote animal growth, although such antibiotics could still be used to treat sick animals.

In January 2001, a Federal interagency task force on antibiotic resistance concluded that "drug-resistant pathogens are a growing menace to all people, regardless of age, gender, or socio-economic background. If we do not act to address the problem . . . [d]rug choices for the treatment of common infections will become increasingly limited and expensive—and, in some cases, nonexistent."

Major medical associations have taken a stand against antibiotic use in animal agriculture. In June 2001, the American Medical Association adopted a resolution opposing nontherapeutic use of antibiotics in animal agriculture. Medical professional organizations that have taken a similar position include the American College of Preventive Medicine, the American Public Health Association, and the Council of State and Territorial Epidemiologists. I ask for unanimous consent to include a letter of endorsement for our legislation from the American Public Health Association in the RECORD.

Most developed countries in the world, with the exception of the United States and Canada, restrict the use of antibiotics for growth promotion in raising livestock. In July 1999, the European Union banned the use for animal growth promotion of remaining human-use antibiotics still in use to promote animal growth. Prior to that action, individual European countries, including the United Kingdom, Denmark, Finland, and Sweden, had banned the use in animal feed of specific antibiotics.

The Preservation of Antibiotics for Human Treatment Act of 2002 will protect the health of Americans by phasing out the non-therapeutic use in livestock of medically important antibiotics, unless their manufacturers can show that they pose no danger to the public health. The Act requires this same tough standard of new applications for approval of animal antibiotics. The Act does not restrict use of antibiotics to treat sick animals or to treat pets and other animals not used for food.

In October 2000, FDA found that one class of antibiotics posed such a grave danger to the public health that they issued an order to withdraw these drugs from animal use. Yet, over 18 months later, tons of these drugs are still being used, because their manufacturer has refused to comply with FDA's order. The Act takes immediate action to implement the decision of FDA to withdraw these drugs from our food supply.

The National Academy of Sciences has found that eliminating the use of antibiotics as feed additives would cost each American consumer not more than $5 to $10 per year. Nonetheless, the legislation recognizes that there may be economic costs to farmers in making the transition to antibiotics-free farming practices. For this reason, the Act provides for Federal payments to farmers to defray their costs in switching to antibiotic-free husbandry practices, with a preference given to family farms.

Antibiotics are one of the crown jewels of modern medicine. If we squander their effectiveness, the health of millions of Americans will be put at risk.

The most vulnerable among us, children, the elderly, persons with HIV/AIDS, are particularly endangered by resistant infections. I urge my colleagues to support this needed legislation to protect the health of all Americans and preserve the effectiveness of antibiotics.

I ask unanimous consent that a letter of support and an analysis of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN PUBLIC HEALTH ASSOCIATION,
Washington, DC, May 1, 2002.

Hon. EDWARD M. KENNEDY,
Chairman, Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR MISTER CHAIRMAN: On behalf of the 50,000 members of the American Public Health Association, I am writing to express our strongest support for the Preservation of Antibiotics for Human Treatment Act of 2002. The Act proposes to withdraw certain antibiotics used in healthy food animals to enhance their growth, as well as a class of antibiotics related to the anthrax drug Cipro and used in poultry. These withdrawals will help prevent transmission of antibiotic resistant bacteria in food.

It is common to add antibiotics to the feed of cattle, pigs, and poultry to speed their growth. But it also speeds the development of antibiotic resistant bacteria on farms, that can then contaminate the meat and cause food-borne illnesses for which treatment options are then limited. The evidence of harm to public health resulting from this practice has only gown. It is time for Congress to make the health of consumers a priority and put an end to this practice.

According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, there are 1.4 million cases of Salmonella infection in the U.S. each year. Most of these infections are acquired from food, and many of them are resistant to five or more antibiotics. The Salmonella found in commercial meat and poultry products has already become resistant to a number of the most commonly used antibiotics. Your bill would phase out each of these drugs as a feed additive for healthy animals.

The bill also calls for withdrawal of a precious class of antibiotics now used to treat pneumonia in poultry. Since the approval of the fluoroquinolone antibiotics in 1995, Campylobacter, the most common food-borne infection, has developed resistance, and FDA has called for the drug's withdrawal in poultry. APHA has gone on record supporting the FDA's action.

We are pleased to support this important piece of legislation, and will work with you to see that it is passed. Please contact Natalie Raynor for further information.

Sincerely,

MOHAMMAD N. AKHTER,
Executive Director.

THE PRESERVATION OF ANTIBIOTICS FOR HUMAN TREATMENT ACT OF 2002

BACKGROUND

The widespread use of antibiotics beginning in the 1940's provided, for the first time in history, effective treatments for infectious diseases. These miracle drugs have saved countless lives, but they are losing their effectiveness. Antibiotics that once had the power to cure dangerous infections are now often useless, because microbes have become resistant to all but the newest and most expensive drugs, and some "superbugs" are impervious to any weapons in the medical arsenal. Resistance to antibiotics takes a heavy toll on patients across the Nation. The World Health Organization estimates that 14,000 Americans die every year from drug-resistant infections. This means that one American dies from a resistant infection every 38 minutes.

It seems scarcely believable that these precious medications could be fed by the ton to chickens and pigs, but that's exactly what's happening in farms all over America. Over 20 million pounds of antibiotics are fed to farm animals every year. That's more than is used in all of medicine. These precious drugs aren't even used to treat sick animals. They are used to fatten pigs and speed the growth of chickens. The result of this rampant overuse is clear: meat contaminated with drug-resistant bacteria sits on supermarket shelves all over America. Every family is potentially at risk. The most vulnerable among us, children, the elderly, persons with HIV/AIDS, are particularly endangered by resistant infections.

At a time when the Nation is relying on antibiotics and other medications to protect our homeland's security from the grave threat of bioterrorism, we can no longer squander these precious weapons in the fight against disease by feeding them indiscriminately to livestock.

PROVISIONS OF THE LEGISLATION

The Preservation of Antibiotics for Human Treatment Act of 2002 will protect the health of Americans by phasing out the non-therapeutic use in livestock of medically important antibiotics, unless their manufacturers can show that they pose no danger to the public health. The Act requires this same tough standard of new applications for approval of animal antibiotics.

The Act does not restrict use of antibiotics to treat sick animals or to treat pets and other animals not used for food.

In October 2000, FDA found that one class of antibiotics posed such a grave danger to the public health that they issued an order to withdraw these drugs from animal use. Yet, over 18 months later, tons of these drugs are still being used, because their manufacturer has refused to comply with FDA's order. The Act takes immediate action to implement the decision of FDA to withdraw these drugs from our food supply.

The Act provides for Federal payments to farmers to defray their costs in switching to antibiotic-free husbandry practices, with a preference given to family farms.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I rise today to join my colleagues, Senator KENNEDY of Massachusetts and Senator BINGAMAN of New Mexico, in introducing this timely and important legislation. The Preservation of Antibiotics for Human Treatment Act of 2002 will address a critical public health concern facing our nation.

There has been mounting scientific evidence that the overuse in animal husbandry of certain antibiotics is increasing the resistance to those antibiotics of bacteria that cause human disease. In farming, the drugs are often added to the feed of healthy animals to promote growth and productivity.

In 1997 and again in 2000, the World Health Organization recommended that antibiotics used to treat humans should not be used to promote animal growth, though the drugs could still be used to treat sick animals. Most developed countries, other than the United States and Canada, restrict the use of antimicrobials in growth promotion.

In July 1998, the National Academy of Sciences concluded in a report that there is a link among the use of antibiotics in food animals, the development of bacterial resistance to these drugs and human disease.

Our legislation will require that an animal drug in the fluoroquinolone class of antibiotics, such as ciprofloxacin, and an other critical drug, such as penicillin and tetracycline, will be considered unsafe as an additive in animal feed unless the drug's manufacturer can demonstrate that use in animal feed of the drug does not pose a harm to human health. In addition, the legislation will require that the Food and Drug Administration refuse to approve a veterinary drug application for any antimicrobial drug critical to human health care. For drugs that are currently added to animal feed, the legislation will require that the drug's use be phased out over the next two years.

It should be noted that three large commercial poultry producers have recently volunteered to significantly reduce or stop the use of antibiotics in their healthy chickens. In addition, the New York Times reported in February that the industry is stopping the use of a particular drug that is related to Cipro, which is used to treat anthrax in humans. The Times reported as well that some corporate consumers including McDonalds, Wendy's and Popeye's are refusing to buy chicken treated with that drug.

Some will be concerned that our legislation may impose a heavy burden on family farmers. As a means to reduce any burden, the legislation will also authorize payment to producers of livestock or poultry that substantially reduce there nontherapeutic use of antimicrobials in animal feed. Family-owned and family-operated farms or ranches will get priority in the awarding of these payments. And while we understand the concerns of those farmers, we anticipate that the legislation will be a significant step in helping the public health system maintain an effective arsenal against serious diseases, including anthrax, sepsis, strep and salmonella, many of which result in serious illness or death in both children and adults.

By Mrs. HUTCHISON (for herself, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. LOTT, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. INOUYE, Mrs. FEINSTEIN, Mr. BUNNING, Mr. CRAIG, Ms. COLLINS, Mr. SHELBY, and Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire):

S. 2509. A bill to amend the Defense Base Closure and Realignment Act of 1990 to specify additional selection criteria for the 2005 round of defense base closures and realignments, and for other purposes; to the Committee of Armed Services.

Mrs. HUTCHISON. Mr. President, I rise today to offer legislation that addresses an issue of great concern to our Nation's current and future security as well as to hundreds of communities across our country.

We have endeavored to reduce the excess infrastructure of our armed forces four times in the past 15 years through the appointment of a BRAC commission whose charter was to recommended the elimination or realignment of unneeded bases. Four times these commissions have made recommendations to the President resulting in the closure of 106 major bases. I would like to agree that in each instance, the best decision was made and the military is now better off without these facilities; however, this is not the case. Mistakes have been made.

While most of these selections were proper, some have resulted in significant, unintended consequences. Staggering costs to clean up the environmental liabilities left behind is one such example. At the former Navy Station Long Beach, CA, post-closure clean up costs have consumed hundreds of millions of dollars more than had been anticipated. The final cost of closing that base remains unknown. How can the savings of closing this base be cited when even seven years later the costs continue to grow?

The lack of facilities now available to properly train our remaining forces is another. When justifying the closure of Reese Air Force Base in 1995, the commission's report stated that "the Air Force has a surplus of undergraduate pilot training facilities." However, only five years later, this service had a shortage of over 1,200 pilots. To make up for that shortfall, the Air Force was compelled to hastily establish another training base, at tremendous cost to the taxpayer.

The severe economic impact that small, rural communities have endured is yet another unintended consequence. The '95 commission's decision to convey Fort Chafee to the local community was scandalous. How was a small, rural community like Barling, AR supposed to turn a post like Chaffee, pockmarked with over 700 World War II-era buildings, each contaminated with lead paint and Asbestos, into an economic asset to the community? They couldn't. While the closure of Chaffee may have saved the Pentagon money, it saddled a small town with an expensive, environmentally hazardous burden.

I am convinced the root cause of these regrettable selections was vague and inefficient criteria which the commissions used in their efforts to select candidates for closure or realignment. To ensure we do not repeat these mistakes, I have worked closely with a number of my colleagues, particularly Senator BINGAMAN, to develop legislation that would refine the minimum criteria the commission must consider. Among the new criteria are: the impact on homeland security; the effects on co-located Federal agencies; and lessons learned in the previous rounds of closures. This measure also promotes greater transparency by requiring the weighting of these criteria be published well before a commission recommends any base for closure.

I know the outcome of the 2005 BRAC is of utmost importance to both the military and the communities outside the fence. I urge my colleagues to support this bill to ensure that the proper decisions are made, and that they are made for the proper reasons.

I ask unanimous consent the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENTS ON SUBMITTED RESOLUTIONS

SENATE RESOLUTION 266—DESIGNATING OCTOBER 10, 2002, AS "PUT THE BRAKES ON FATALITIES DAY"

Mr. ROBERTS (for himself, Mr. BROWNBACK, and Mr. DEWINE) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. RES. 266

Whereas traffic fatalities needlessly claim the lives of more than 40,000 Americans each year;

Whereas traffic crashes are the leading cause of death in the United States for people ages 6 to 28 years;

Whereas 63 percent of those killed in traffic crashes are not wearing safety belts;

Whereas roadside hazards, substandard road conditions, and obsolete roadway designs contribute to more than 15,000 highway deaths annually— nearly ⅓ of all fatal crashes;

Whereas more than 3,000,000 people are injured in traffic crashes in the United States each year;

Whereas there are more than 6,000,000 nonfatal traffic crashes in the United States each year;

Whereas deaths and injuries on highways in the United States cost society more than $230,000,000,000 annually;

Whereas approximately 4,900 pedestrians and 750 bicyclists are killed annually in traffic related crashes;

Whereas safer driving behaviors through the use of seat belts, not drinking and driving, and obeying traffic laws need to be encouraged;

Whereas use of simple, cost-effective roadway safety improvements such as all weather signing and marking, traffic signals, skid resistant pavements, and removal of roadside hazards would greatly reduce crashes;

Whereas continued development of ever-safer vehicles, protective equipment, and roadways would reduce traffic-related fatalities and injuries; and

Whereas cooperation between Federal, State, and local governments, private companies, and associations is essential to increasing highway safety: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate—

(1) designates October 10, 2002, as "Put the Brakes on Fatalities Day"; and

(2) requests that the President issue a proclamation urging the people of the United States and interested groups to encourage safe driving and other roadway use.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 110—HONORING THE HEROISM AND COURAGE DISPLAYED BY AIRLINE FLIGHT ATTENDANTS ON A DAILY BASIS

Mrs. FEINSTEIN (for herself, Mrs. HUTCHISON, Mrs. BOXER, Mr. DASCHLE, Ms. CANTWELL, Ms. COLLINS, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. REID, Mr. WARNER, Mr. BAYH, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. TORRICELLI, Mr. DURBIN, Mr. GRAHAM, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. DAYTON, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. ENSIGN, Mr. REED, Mr. SPECTER, Mrs. MURRAY, Mr. BOND, Mr. CRAIG, Mr. HUTCHINSON, Mr. KERRY, Mr. DODD, Mr. CORZINE, Mr. WELLSTONE, Ms. LANDRIEU, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. WYDEN, Mr. AKAKA, Mr. HATCH, Mr. NELSON of Florida, Mr. BUNNING, Mr. SANTORUM, Mr. FEINGOLD, Mr. ALLEN, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. DEWINE, Mrs. CLINTON, Mrs. LINCOLN, Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire, Mr. SCHUMER, Ms. SNOWE, Mr. CLELAND, Mr. BREAUX, Mrs. CARNAHAN, Mr. DOMENICI, Ms. MIKULSKI, Mr. JOHNSON, and Mr. LIEBERMAN) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation:

S. CON. RES. 110

Whereas over 100,000 men and women in the United States serve as flight attendants;

Whereas flight attendants dedicate themselves to serving and protecting their passengers;

Whereas flight attendants react to dangerous situations as the first line of defense of airline passengers;

Whereas safety and security are the primary concerns of flight attendants;

Whereas flight attendants evacuate passengers from an airplane in emergency situations;

Whereas flight attendants defend passengers against hijackers, terrorists, and abusive passengers;

Whereas flight attendants handle in-flight medical emergencies;

Whereas flight attendants perform routine safety and service duties on board the aircraft;

Whereas 25 flight attendants lost their lives aboard 4 hijacked flights on September 11, 2001;

Whereas 5 flight attendants helped to prevent United Flight 93 from reaching its intended target on September 11, 2001;

Whereas flight attendants provided assistance to passengers across the United States who had their flights diverted on September 11, 2001;

Whereas flight attendants on American Airlines Flight 63 helped to subdue Richard Reid on December 22, 2001, thereby preventing him from detonating an explosive device in his shoe intended to bring down the airplane and kill all 185 passengers and 12 crew members on board; and

Whereas flight attendants helped to prevent Pablo Moreira, a Uruguayan citizen, from breaking into the cockpit on February 7, 2002 during United Flight 855 from Miami to Buenos Aires: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That Congress—

(1) expresses its profound gratitude for the faithful service provided by flight attendants to make air travel safe;

(2) honors the courage and dedication of flight attendants;

(3) supports all the flight attendants who continue to display heroism on a daily basis, as they had been doing before, during, and after September 11, 2001; and

(4) shall send a copy of this resolution to a family member of each of the flight attendants killed on September 11, 2001.

Mrs. FEINSTEIN. Mr. President, I rise today to submit a concurrent resolution honoring flight attendants for the courage, dedication, and heroism they display on a daily basis as the first line of defense against trouble and terror in our skies.

From the events of September 11, we have all taken great pride in the heroism and courage displayed by rescue workers, firemen, and first responders. These were the men and women running into the burning and collapsing buildings to help those who were running out get to safety. Who knows what the death toll would have been that dreadful day without the help of these brave heroes.

Since September 11, the United States has rallied behind the courage and dedication of our troops abroad who are rooting out terrorism. American soldiers are protecting the United States from future terrorist attacks and as we all know, lives have been lost.

I cannot say enough about what the policemen, firemen, rescue workers, and the men and women of our armed services have done to protect all of us.

However, one group of American heroes that I also want to make sure receive their proper recognition are the approximately 100,000 men and women who serve as flight attendants in the United States today.

Flight attendants dedicate themselves to serving and protecting their passengers.

Flight attendants react to dangerous situations on airplanes as the first line of defense of airline passengers and the pilots in the cockpit.

Flight attendants evacuate passengers from the airplane in emergency situations.

Flight attendants have defended passengers against hijackers, terrorists, and abusive passengers.

Flight attendants handle in-flight medical emergencies.

And as we all know, many flight attendants lost their lives on September 11 as they fought with terrorists.

Clearly flight attendants do more than serve food and drinks on the plane.

They are the police, the fire department, the paramedics, and the bomb squad at 30,000 feet above ground. Just one of these responsibilities would overwhelm most people. Yet, flight attendants manage to balance these roles day in and day out.

Flight attendants have enormous responsibilities and they face tremendous dangers in flight.

To honor the dedication, courage, and commitment flight attendants make everyday, I am offering this resolution to: 1. Express the gratitude of Congress for the faithful service provided by flight attendants to make air travel safe; 2. Honor the courage and dedication of flight attendants; 3. Support flight attendants as they continue to display heroism on a daily basis; and 4. Send a copy of this resolution to a family member of each of the flight attendants killed on September 11, 2001.

In this resolution, we mention three specific instances where flight attendants have courageously intervened to save the lives of others.

We all know about the heroic passengers and crew of Flight 93 on September 11, 2001. The flight from Newark, New Jersey to San Francisco was hijacked that dreadful morning. Yet the terrorists were prevented from crashing the airplane into its intended target by brave passengers and crew. Among the crew that sacrificed their lives were five United Airlines flight attendants.

A few months later, terrorist Richard Reid tried to blow up American Airlines Flight 63. He too was stopped with the help of flight attendants as he tried to light explosives in his shoes.

Speaking of the flight attendants aboard Flight 93, one passenger said, "There's no question that all of us on board owe our lives to them. [Reid] was fighting to the death."

And in February of this year, flight attendants and pilots aboard United Airlines Flight 855 prevented a passenger from breaking into the cockpit while the plane was traveling from Miami to Buenos Aires.

These are only a few examples of times when flight attendants have stepped forward to risk their lives to protect others. And unfortunately there will always be a tremendous amount of risk for the men and women who work aboard airplanes every day.

I want to point out that this resolution is the result of a letter by a flight attendant in Sacramento, California who wrote to me. I would like to insert the letter into the RECORD and read some of it aloud.

Heather Lauter-Clay, a United Airlines flight attendant, wrote:

> From the deepest part of my heart, I am asking for your support in carrying a resolution to honor Flight Attendants. It would mean so much to Flight Attendants to be given the respect and support that they so deserve.

Heather, I completely agree and I am proud to offer this resolution to honor our flight attendants.

I also want to enter this note into the RECORD. It was given to me by Kristin Spivey, a United flight attendant, on my trip home over the weekend. I was especially touched by Ms. Spivey's note, which was written on an airplane cocktail napkin. The note reads:

> "Senator Feinstein: I am so pleased to have you on our flight today. It has been an honor to serve you—just to meet you. Thank you for sponsoring the bill to acknowledge flight attendants' contributions on September 11th. It was very difficult to lose so many flying partners to something so senseless.
>
> In the aftermath it was hard to go on, despite the fact that I love my job and would not give it up, because so few seemed to understand my sense of loss. It is also comforting to believe that all those onboard flight 93 died for a reason—to save many others in Washington.
>
> You do them a great honor in remembering that. I know you can help others understand all this. Thank you for speaking for us. I know my fallen colleagues would be proud.
>
> Kristin Spivey (D.C. based)

I think this note from Ms. Spivey makes it clear that this resolution is very important and I hope the Congress will pass this legislation soon.

To the flight attendants serving today and every day: Thank You.

I ask unanimous consent that letters of support for this resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DAVIS, CA.

DEAR SENATOR DIANNE FEINSTEIN: I am a United Airlines Flight Attendant. On September 11th, our United Family was forever changed. In the weeks and months following the tragedy, we have been mourning the loss of our colleagues and loss of ourselves. Our world as we knew it has been forever changed.

On that fateful day, the grief was immense for us. We lost 16 or our crewmembers in one hour, on one day. We were stricken with feelings of sadness, fear, confusion and panic. Many of us were stranded, away from home. As the unknown lingered, we still held onto the thoughts of what our colleagues faced in their last moments. Meanwhile, knowing that we too would soon be boarding an airplane.

As a flight attendant, we have taken an oath "to provide comfort, care and safety" to our passengers. On September 11th, our flight attendants were doing their job. All of the previous protocols that were in place for hijacking situations failed them. They died protecting their passengers in the best way that they knew how. As we know, in the last moments of flight, they were unselfishly caring for others. Flight Attendants assisted in bringing down UAL 93 by boiling water to throw on the hijackers and others were on the phones to supervisors detailing what was transpiring on the planes.

As we approach 4 months since Sept. 11th, our flight attendants are still continuing to be faced with sadness, grief, and mourning. The skies as we now know them, are a host to uncertainty. Possible terrorist threats are continually present. Airline safety is still compromised. United has layed off thousands of flight attendants and job security is wavering.

Over these past months, firefighters, policemen, postal workers and others have been honored for their heroism and dedication to Sept 11th. Flight Attendants have not and this hurts us. We too, go to work each day, to serve and protect, knowing that we may not come home to our loved ones. We too know the importance of carrying on with our job, despite what we may encounter, even the possibility of death. Our commitment, bravery and dedication to the public have never ceased during and after the events of September 11th. Our crews of UAL 93 and UAL 175 died unsung heroes.

From the deepest part of my heart, I am asking for your support in carrying a resolution to honor Flight Attendants. It would mean so much to Flight Attendants to be given the respect and support that they so deserve. The crews of UAL 93, UAL 175, AA 11, and AA 77 died unsung heroes. The countless Flight Attendants who have been flying since Sept. 11th continually display valor, gallantry, courage, and bravery in the midst of a world that is forever changed.

Senator Feinstein, thank you for your consideration.

Sincerely,

HEATHER LAUTER-CLAY.

SENATOR FEINSTEIN: I am so pleased to have you on our flight today. It has been an honor to serve you—just to meet you. Thank you for sponsoring the bill to acknowledge flight attendants' contributions on September 11th. It was very difficult to lose so many flying partners to something so senseless. In the aftermath it was hard to go on, despite the fact that I love my job and would not give it up, because so few seemed to understand my sense of loss. It is also comforting to believe that all those onboard flight 93 died for a reason—to save many others in Washington. You do them a great honor in remembering that. I know you can help others understand all this. Thank you for speaking for us. I know my fallen colleagues would be proud.

L. KRISTIN SPIVEY,
D.C. based.

TRANSPORT WORKERS UNION OF AMERICA, AFL-CIO, AIR TRANSPORT LOCAL 556, Dallas, TX, May 13, 2002.

Senator DIANNE FEINSTEIN,
U.S. Senate, Hart Senate Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR FEINSTEIN: As President of Transport Workers Union Local 556 representing the 7000+ hard working Flight Attendants at Southwest Airlines, I am writing in support of your proposed resolution honoring all Flight Attendants.

Before September 11, 2001, Flight Attendants insured the safety and comfort of airline passengers. On September 11, 2001, Flight Attendants were the first to sacrifice their lives for the safety of the aircraft and passengers. Since September 11, 2001, Flight Attendants have been first in enabling airplanes and passengers to the skies. For many Flight Attendants, their only reward since September 11, 2001 has been a "pink slip" as they were also among the first to lose their jobs in cutbacks related to the "Attack on America".

Thank you for your leadership and for sponsoring a resolution which will bring well-deserved recognition to the over 100,000 Flight Attendants in America who make me proud to wear my wings.

Respectfully,

THOM MCDANIEL,
TWU Local 556 President.

Mrs. HUTCHISON. Mr. President, I rise today with Senator FEINSTEIN and 50 of my colleagues to submit a resolution to honor the service and professionalism of the men and women in the United States who serve as flight attendants.

A career as a flight attendant requires a deep commitment. Their schedules are unpredictable, their work hours are long and intense, and the nature of the job causes long absences from the company of family and friends. Not too many years ago, a flight attendant, or "stewardess", could be fired for getting married or becoming pregnant. Happily, those dark ages are over, thanks to the sacrifices made by generations of flight attendants who have served all of us.

Today's flight attendants are dedicated men and women who are charged with many important responsibilities. Of course, they serve food and beverages to passengers under cramped and difficult conditions. They also assist children traveling alone, as well as elderly and disabled passengers. When requires, they administer first aid, including CPR and artificial respiration. Most of all, they are responsible for the safety and security of the passengers from the time the aircraft pulls away from the gate, and they are on duty until the plane arrives at its destination.

On September 11, terrorism struck the United States as hijacked aircraft were used as massive weapons of destruction. Despite being trained merely to comply with the hijackers' demands and to calm the passengers, many went above and beyond these limitations and displayed great courage. Using cell phones to relay information to ground crews, crews aboard American Airlines Flights 11 and 77 and United Airlines Flights 93 and 175 assisted law enforcement officials in identifying the hijackers and assessing the nature of the threats. Despite the ultimate loss of their lives, the crews of these flights took heroic steps trying to thwart the terrorists' intentions and prevented further destruction. It is humbling to realize that many of our lives, as well as our beloved Capitol building, may have been saved by the sacrifices of the crew of flight 93.

On October 1, another potentially disastrous event was averted on American Airlines Flight 1238 traveling from Los Angeles to Chicago, when a passenger attempted to break through the cockpit door to attack the flight crew. The cabin crew helped stop the attempt and ingeniously placed serving carts to secure the cockpit.

On December 28, 2001, quick thinking flight attendants made the difference on American Airlines Flight 63 en route from Paris to Miami, when Richard Reid, an accused al Qaeda-trained terrorist, attempted to light a powerful explosive concealed in his shoes. An alert flight attendant led the rest of the cabin crew in a successful struggle to prevent a devastating explosion. Reid was restrained and ultimately arrested, but not before several flight attendants were injured in the battle to subdue Reid.

I encourage flight attendants to continue to provide America's travelers with the service and security we need to revive our aviation industry. I urge my Senate colleagues to join with me in saluting and honoring America's flight attendants and by passing this resolution.

(3) Studies have shown that incubator tenant companies have an average success rate of 87 percent, and 90 percent for technology-based incubator tenant companies. These success rates are dramatically higher than the success rates for companies in the general economy.

(4) Incubator companies are also more likely to remain in the same communities as they grow and to provide high paying jobs and benefits to their employees.

(5) Business incubators help academic institutions contribute to local goals of sustaining economic development in their surrounding communities.

(6) Education in entrepreneurship and other business formation skills is essential to business success and sustainable economic development.

(7) Studies have shown that every 50 jobs created by a business in an incubator generate another 25 jobs in that incubator's community.

SENATE—Tuesday, May 14, 2002

(Legislative day of Thursday, May 9, 2002)

The Senate met at 9:30 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable MAX CLELAND, a Senator from the State of Georgia.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Dr. Lloyd John Ogilvie, offered the following prayer:

Hear God's word in Proverbs 3:3–4:

Let love and faithfulness never leave you; bind them around your neck, write them on the tablet of your heart. Then you will win favor and a good name in the sight of God and man.

Let us pray:

Thank You, dear God, for this reminder of what is ultimately important to You. We commit this day to love You with all our minds and hearts. When love for You is our primary motivation, life becomes a delight and not a drudgery. The strain and stress are gone. We are free to work with one commanding goal: to do everything we do to glorify You. Faithfulness flows naturally. We are accountable to You. Help us to remember that every action, word, and decision is open to Your judgment. Bless the Senators today with the profound peace of trusting You completely and serving You with love and faithfulness. Amen.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The Honorable MAX CLELAND led the Pledge of Allegiance, as follows:

> I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. BYRD).

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

> U.S. SENATE,
> PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
> Washington, DC, May 14, 2002.
>
> To the Senate:
>
> Under the provisions of rule I, paragraph 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable MAX CLELAND, a Senator from the State of Georgia, to perform the duties of the Chair.
>
> ROBERT C. BYRD,

Mr. CLELAND thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada is recognized.

SCHEDULE

Mr. REID. Mr. President, the Chair will shortly announce that we will be in a period for morning business until 10:30 a.m. today, with the first half controlled by the Republican leader and the second half under the control of the majority leader, or their respective designees. At 10:30 a.m. we will resume consideration of the trade bill, with 10 minutes of debate prior to a vote in relation to the Baucus-Grassley amendment regarding investors. Following disposition of the Baucus amendment, Senator DAYTON will be recognized to offer the Dayton-Craig amendment regarding unfair trade practices. We will recess from 12:30 p.m. to 2:15 p.m. today for our weekly party conferences.

Mr. President, there is a lot of interest in this legislation. There will be a significant number of amendments offered. The majority leader has indicated he wants Senators to have that opportunity to offer amendments. We hope Members will do that. We also hope we can work on time agreements on these amendments and move this legislation forward. This legislation has the interest of both leaders in the Senate. The President has spoken about it often. It is legislation we have to move. And remember, a week from Friday we go into our Memorial Day recess. We have a lot of work to do prior to that time, and one of the items we have to dispose of is this legislation before we can do other things. Noting that, I look forward to a very productive day.

RESERVATION OF LEADER TIME

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the leadership time is reserved.

MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 10:30 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak for up to 10 minutes each. Under the previous order, the time until 10 a.m. shall be under the control of the Republican leader or his designee.

The Senator from Wyoming.

TRADE LEGISLATION

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, we are finally moving forward on the trade bill. I hope we can move quickly. It is one of the more important issues before us, of which there are many. I say again, I hope we can take a look at this bill in terms of what it is designed to do, and that is to provide for the President an outline of how he may negotiate trade agreements and bring those trade agreements, within the guidelines in the bill now, to the Senate, and the Senate can approve or disapprove.

Negotiations have to be done broadly by two parties. It cannot be done by 535 Members of Congress. I am hopeful we can get down to the core issue with regard to trade so that the United States can keep up with the rest of the world.

Over the past 10 years, since 1994 when this trade authority has not been in place, countries around the world have moved forward with various agreements, and the United States has not been able to do that. Large agreements were made by others.

The more amendments we have, the more difficult it will be to get down to what we are really seeking to do, and that is to have negotiations which will give the United States fair opportunities for trade.

FEDERAL HIGHWAY TRUST FUND

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I wish to speak about a different issue that is very important to all of us, certainly in Wyoming where we have long distances to travel. As we say, we have low population and small towns with very long streets.

Transportation and highways are very important to us. Highways, of course, have generally been funded by a combination of Federal funds and State funds, Federal funds being very important and continuing to be even more important as time goes by. What we do with State highways and State highway funding becomes one of the principal issues with which we have to deal.

Several years ago, we had the 21st century TEA–21, which was an appropriation and a plan for highway funding. Last week, the Finance Committee held a hearing regarding the status of the highway trust fund. This highway trust fund, it seems to me, is terribly important because as a member of the Environment and Public Works Committee, I helped craft this Transportation Equity Act, or TEA–21, as it is called, which provides more dollars for the States than in the past and has a very good distribution system which basically allocates money to the States and lets them decide how those dollars are going to be spent.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by a Member of the Senate on the floor.

As we all know, TEA–21 most significantly funded the Federal highway needs. As a result, people across the country had opportunities to improve the surface transportation system to make it safer and more efficient and to keep up with the times.

More importantly, as I mentioned, TEA–21 provided States and local governments more flexibility in controlling the use of those Federal funds which, frankly, is one of the issues we should deal with constantly; that is, in the distribution of Federal assistance, how we best do that so there is accountability on one hand and on the other hand recognize the difference that exists in various places. I am certain highway moneys are used for different needs in Wyoming than in Delaware. We need to have the flexibility to recognize those differences.

The panelists who testified at this hearing on the funding mechanisms—that is their job; funding of the highway trust fund is what we rely upon. This hearing addressed a $4.4 billion shortfall in the highway trust fund which is due to the negative revenue alignment budget. Economies are somewhat lower, and these dollars are lower under the formula. We are in the process of trying to replace the $4.4 billion so we do not have that loss and hopefully at least most of that can be done.

In addition, however, the panelists detailed the tax disparity between gasoline and ethanol blend, gasohol. Currently, gasohol is taxed at 13.1 cents and gasoline is taxed at 18.4 cents. This disparity is something that has to be reviewed. That is where the money comes from for highway funds. When we have less money coming in, obviously we are going to have less to spend.

The discrepancy between the fuels is causing a great debate not only in the context of the highway trust fund but in terms of our national energy policy as well. Pending before the conference committee is the energy bill which has substantial increases and requirements for increases in ethanol, which has merit. On the other hand, if that is going to reduce the availability of highway funding, then we have to take a look at a system that allows that to happen.

The General Accounting Office estimates the tax disparity between gasohol and gasoline will cost approximately $21 billion over the next 11 years, and this is a pretty serious issue in terms, again, of funding our national highway program.

As my colleagues know, the Senate passed the energy bill that mandates 5 billion gallons of ethanol by 2012.

As a result of this, of course, we will have an increased reliance on gasohol. So we need to take a look at this. I am not suggesting any particular bias one way or the other, other than the fact that by making this change in the use of fuel, we have a change in the revenue that will be available if we continue to have the same formula for doing that.

Gasohol, which of course is the ethanol, is taxed at 13.1 cents a gallon; gas fuel is 18.4 cents. As to the trust fund, under the gas arrangements we have now, 15 cents of it goes into the highway fund; under the gasohol-ethanol, it is only 7 cents.

So we find ourselves with a substantial change, a substantial differential, in terms of how we will be funding our highways. I hope that in the course of the committee activities we can take a long look at it.

SENATE AGENDA

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I will share some general thoughts I have. It seems to me as we look forward to the remainder of this session, the time is getting pretty short. In a couple of weeks we will begin our Memorial Day recess, and then we will be moving on towards our Fourth of July recess, of course. So between now and the time we adjourn for this year, we do not have an awful lot of time remaining.

We collectively ought to see if we can figure out how we are going to accomplish many of the things that have to be done. Obviously, that is the responsibility of leadership, but we have not moved very quickly. We spent a very long time on energy—6 weeks. We have spent more time now on this trade bill, and it looks as if the prospect is we will be spending even more time than we had anticipated.

We have a lot of things facing us. I hope we can wrap up the trade bill. I think it is very important. I think it is part of our future economy.

As we do these things, I hope we can have a little vision of where we want to be when we are through. What do we want to happen with trade, for example, in the next 10 years? Do we want to be part of the trade process, with hopefully having fair trade around the world which will increase our opportunities to export?

Thirty to thirty-five percent of our agricultural production has to go into export. As we do this, we think about what it takes to accomplish that goal, if that indeed is our vision.

We are going to be dealing with permanent removal of the estate tax. That has been promised to be one of the things that comes up on the floor. So we have that to deal with.

Immigration and border security is out there. That is very important, particularly important now because of terrorism, and very important in terms of the future: Where do we want to be in the future on immigration? How do we want to handle these things? And what are we doing that will cause us to arrive at where we want to be?

We get a little inclined to look at the politics of the election and look at the politics in the Senate instead of having a vision of where we want the United States, our States, our families and our communities to be in the future, and then testing whether what we are doing now leads us there.

The bankruptcy issue is out there. We have been talking about that for a very long time. There are some real problems that need to be resolved. We have not managed to get it to the floor.

We do not have a budget. We were supposed to have a budget prior to now. We have none. The budget is very important. If we are somewhat concerned about spending and having an opportunity to at least limit spending and hope we can keep it down to a minimum to get that job done, we do not even have a budget, and, frankly, there is no sign of one appearing.

Whether we like it or not, we are going to have to spend some time on the cloning issue. It has been promised that cloning and research—not an easy issue—would be before us.

Then there is educational funding. We talk about education all the time. We have not even gotten to that. That is one issue that is going to be out there.

Certainly, we have the issue of reinsurance for terrorism, an issue we keep talking about, but it is still not here. This is very difficult.

Nuclear storage is an issue I am certain we need to handle. Obviously, again there are some problems pertaining to that issue. One can ignore it if they choose, but the fact is we do have nuclear waste stored around the country in a very unsafe way and we need to find a place to put that, particularly if nuclear energy is going to be part of our future. I hope it is. If one likes clean air, then nuclear generation is one of the ways to do that.

We spent 6 weeks debating energy. Now we have not even moved into our conference committee.

Frankly, I am a little disappointed about the fact that we have all of these things out there, and we recognize these are issues with which we must deal.

Appropriations may be one of the most important things we do, not only in terms of funding the Government but in terms of giving great direction to where we want to be. The appropriations process has a good deal to do with whether we want huge government involved in every issue or whether we want to limit government. Appropriations has something to do with that, and they are very important. We are not there by any means.

So we have a great deal to do, and I hope we can find ourselves in a position to move forward to accomplish these things. There are many more issues, I suppose, but these have already been listed as things we are going to do, as has been said, before we adjourn.

We have some real problems to deal with. I hope we can move quickly to address these issues and find some suitable remedies for them.

I yield the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DURBIN. I ask unanimous consent to be recognized in morning business.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SOCIAL SECURITY AND MEDICARE

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. President, I listened carefully to the comments of my colleague from the State of Wyoming and the discussion about the Senate agenda. I could not agree more. There are certain issues the Senate should take up and take up as quickly as possible. We face some serious challenges, not the least of which relate to Social Security and Medicare.

The Social Security trust fund, which many of us made solemn oaths and pledges never to touch, is about to be invaded by both political parties at this point in time because of the deficit we face.

We are in a deficit situation after several years of the good experience of surpluses and reducing our national debt and reducing the debt of the Social Security trust fund because, frankly, we have run into some bad situations and also some bad decisions.

We could not have anticipated the recession would go on this long, but it has. We certainly didn't anticipate September 11, which has been very costly to our Government. Last year the President convinced a majority of the Senate and the House to vote for a tax program which, in fact, has virtually decimated the surplus which had been predicted. The President said at the time we had $5.2 trillion in surplus so why not give the money back to the people? Cut the taxes. Why does it stay in Washington?

Some of us who lived through the deficits of the Reagan-Bush era said go slow, be careful, because the deficits could return any day. You just can't tell what's around the corner. But the White House insisted we needed tax cuts—primarily for wealthy people. We did that last year. It turns out this year, instead of a projected $5.2 trillion surplus over the next 10 years we are down to $1.2 trillion. We lost $4 trillion in projected surplus in 1 year.

How did we lose it? For those three reasons: the recession, the war against terrorism, and the tax policy. So we find ourselves now trying to put together a budget and not raid the Social Security trust fund. That is why we are tied up in knots. It was a tax program pushed by the President which came too fast, without enough thought. It took away our surplus. It took the money out of our hands to deal with the challenges facing America.

I did not vote for it. I think that is fairly obvious from my comments. But now, as many other Members of the Senate, I am facing the reality we have to try to put the budget together, even with this deficit situation. The President comes to us and says we need additional resources to fight the war against terrorism. He is right. He will get support from Congress for that, both for the Department of Defense and for homeland security.

Of course that money is going to come out of the Social Security trust fund because we are in a deficit situation again. Many of us are concerned, too, because the President has said: Incidentally, I want more tax cuts. The ones last year were not enough. We should take last year's tax cuts and add on to them. If you look at the President's proposal, what it would do is once again threaten the Social Security trust fund.

That does not make sense because we are just facing the possibility—in fact the reality—of the baby boomers showing up for Social Security. Should we not be thinking ahead, making certain Social Security is strong when all of these thousands and millions of Americans who have paid into Social Security their entire lifetime show up and say: I am here. I want to retire. Where is my Social Security check?

No, the President says: Think, instead, of additional tax cuts.

Take a look at those tax cuts, incidentally. If you happen to be making over $300,000 a year, those tax cuts for you average about $40,000 a year in the President's new tax cut round, but if you are making, say, $100,000 a year, it is worth $200 or $300 a year. So there is a great disparity in who will benefit from this tax cut.

But we know who will lose. The American families who have been counting on Social Security are not going to have as strong a Social Security trust fund as they should have because of the President's last tax cut and his proposed tax cut. You cannot keep going to the same well again and again at the expense of senior citizens, at the expense of workers today who, dutifully, every paycheck, put their money down for Social Security and now face the real possibility that when they need Social Security, the system will not be as strong as it should be.

Let's reflect for a moment also on Medicare. The Medicare situation is one that is very troubling. I have traveled across my State of Illinois talking to doctors and nurses and hospital administrators. I have talked to people who are on Medicare. They are concerned. They need to be concerned. For reasons I cannot explain, this White House will not take a serious look at the dangerous state of affairs when it comes to Medicare. In fact, the House of Representatives recently proposed not only cutbacks in Medicare reimbursement for doctors but also further cutbacks to pay for a prescription drug program.

Not surprisingly, hospitals have said if you are going to cut more deeply into Medicare, many of us will be forced to close. So in both Social Security and Medicare we have crisis situations looming and the administration refusing to show leadership. In fact, when it comes to Social Security, the administration is moving in the wrong direction, calling for permanent tax cuts which would additionally threaten Social Security in the future.

I will take just a moment on prescription drugs, if I can. As I travel around my State of Illinois, I find a lot of people, senior citizens in particular, cannot afford prescription drugs. It is understandable if you have taken a look at some of the costs of the drugs now being prescribed. The average American has a hard time paying for them. Certainly a person who is retired cannot come up with the resources to make it work, so many people are making hard choices as to whether they fill prescriptions that the doctors recommend or ignore them or take half of what they are supposed to take. These are tough calls for a lot of senior citizens.

When we take a look at the issue of prescription drugs, it is not just a question of whether a senior under Medicare would have accessibility to these drugs; it is a question of the price of these drugs. Consider this for a minute. The pharmaceutical companies are spending a lot of money—you see it everywhere you turn—advertising their industry and their product. They advertise their industry by saying: We put good research into new drugs and we find cures.

They are right. Thank goodness they do, and we want to encourage that.

Then they go on, of course, to advertise specific drugs.

Take this drug and you will be able to hop through a field of flowers without sneezing.

Take this drug and you will not be depressed.

Take this drug and it will deal with osteoarthritis.

Take this drug and it will deal with pulmonary seizures.

Take this little purple pill and go to our Web site and you'll feel better already.

Take this Viagra—

And so on and so on.

How much are these drug companies spending when it comes to advertising?

They are spending two to three times as much as they do on research. They are spending more money on advertising their drugs than on research on finding new drugs.

To put it in comparison, do you remember Claritin, the drug for allergies? Schering-Plough spent more money in 1 year advertising for Claritin than Pepsi-Cola spent advertising Pepsi the same year; or Anheuser-Busch spent advertising Budweiser. Merck did the same thing with Vioxx.

So when the drug costs keep going up and up, it is reasonable for us to ask the question whether these companies are putting too much money into advertising and not putting enough into research; whether the costs are out of control.

I think it is something we have to address. We have to address the accessibility of drugs and their affordability as part of a prescription drug program. We certainly cannot go the route of the House Republicans of raiding Medicare in order to pay for a prescription drug program. That is what they have suggested.

These are challenges we face. They are challenges which we are going to have to live up to, to make certain we keep our contract with seniors and others who are counting on Social Security and Medicare to be there when they need it.

I yield the floor, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TAX RELIEF AND SPENDING

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in the remaining minutes over which we have control, I wish to respond to a couple of things my friend from Illinois indicated.

One was his being very critical of tax relief and tax reduction. It seems to me in a time when one of the real issues before us is the economy, what could you be doing better to help the economy than to reduce taxes? I think that is why the President has pushed that. That is why more conservatives have pushed that. But to be critical of that when we are trying to do something with the economy seems to be a little out of context.

It also is difficult to wonder why the folks who are the big spenders here are worried about the deficit. We passed a bill that was almost $85 billion more than the previous in agriculture. We did not have any concern about that. So we have people over here who think Government ought to be involved in everything and everyone's lives, and dollars ought to be spent for everything in terms of any program you can think of—and then to hear some concern about the deficit?

I point out, as we talk about problems, there are two sides to these issues and you have to take a little look at what it is you want. If you want a better economy, then you probably need to do something about having taxes be too high. If you don't want to spend so much, you probably ought to take a look at some of the spending bills that you are pushing.

There is a conflict here, but to get up on the floor and complain about reducing taxes yet wanting our economy to be stronger, to get up here and talk about a deficit and then be a great supporter of all the big spending bills—there is a certain conflict there and I think we ought to measure a little bit what we want in terms of what we do in the interim.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CORZINE. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. CLINTON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Under the previous order, the time until 10:30 a.m. shall be under the control of the majority leader or his designee.

The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. CORZINE. Thank you, Madam President.

SOCIAL SECURITY AND WOMEN

Mr. CORZINE. Madam President, this morning I rise to speak on perhaps the most important long-term domestic issue facing our Nation—the future health and security of our Social Security system. Today, I want to focus on proposals to privatize Social Security and the special threat privatization poses to women in America.

Last December, late on a Friday afternoon, before Christmas, President Bush's Social Security Commission released its recommendations for changes in the Social Security system. The Commission's report did not get much media coverage because of the timing of its release, and I think that was obviously by design, if you read the report.

The recommendations of the Bush Commission are dramatic and damaging, if implemented, for the future of all Social Security beneficiaries but particularly for women. They involve deep cuts in guaranteed Social Security benefits—cuts of 25 percent or so for those currently working and up to 45 percent for future workers. Undoubtedly, these proposals would force millions of Americans to delay their retirement so that they would have the ability to live their senior years with economic security.

Few members of the public actually have even heard of the Bush Commission, and they certainly have not talked or debated the recommendations. And fewer have any idea that the Commission is calling for drastic cuts in guaranteed benefits, the type that I outlined.

Americans need to know about these plans, and they need to consider them and debate them in a serious way, making sure they know the implications of taking these recommendations to fruition.

Unfortunately, so far, the administration says it wants to put off any discussion of these proposals until after the election. That is unfortunate and, frankly, it is wrong. We should be debating this issue openly and publicly before the American people, on the Senate floor and certainly before the voters in this November's elections.

To that end, I intend to continue to raise this subject and its implications for the American people as much as I can to make sure that the American people understand what the Bush Commission is recommending to the American public. This Senator thinks it is too important to be decided among closeted policy wonks and politicians in the dark of the night.

Today, I specifically want to raise those aspects of privatization that are damaging to women. I know this is an issue that is near and dear to the Presiding Officer.

Women have a reason to be especially concerned about privatization proposals because they would be among the biggest losers if Social Security is privatized and benefits are cut.

As Joan Bernstein, president of the organization known as OWL, notes in her introductory letter to OWL's Mother's Day report, "Social Security Privatization: A False Promise for Women":

> Social Security is a women's issue. I would go so far as to say that it is the retirement security issue for women today.

OWL notes that today women represent 58 percent of all Social Security recipients—slightly more than 50 percent. They represent 71 percent of beneficiaries aged 85 and over.

Without regular cost-of-living adjusted Social Security benefits, more than half of all older women would be living in poverty. Let me repeat—more than 50 percent. If you look at Hispanic women, it is about 68 percent. If you look at African-American women, it is 61 percent.

I note that Social Security is important not just to older women but also to children and nonretired adults who constitute one-third of current Social Security beneficiaries. These include many women and children who benefit from benefits resulting from the death or disability of a family member.

For a caregiving mother, cutting these benefits is unthinkable.

For these reasons, women have a special stake in Social Security, and their stake in protecting guaranteed benefits should be obvious given women's historic position—sometimes I think unfortunate historic position—in the economic system.

First, women earn less than men. There is a wage gap: on average, 73 cents on every dollar a man earns. Also, they are not compensated for the 12 years, on average, they spend on unpaid caregiving, whether for their children, parents, spouse, or other relatives. And when women work as caregivers, they are often in the economic system as part-time workers, so that their average pay is significantly lower.

The way Social Security is calculated, you look at 35 years of working level—the highest average—and women come up short. The average payout of Social Security benefits for women is about $756 per year. For a man, it is just shy of $1,000 a year.

All this pulls together as women often save less during their working lifetime and are less likely to be eligible for pensions as well. They are denied private pensions. If they do have private pensions, it is often generally less generous, the same way Social Security is less generous for women. In fact, average private pension benefits for women are only about half of those for men. And for most women, their Social Security benefits will also be lower because of those averaged lower earnings that I talked about. It works doubly—in the pension system and also in Social Security.

Finally, and most importantly, women tend to live longer than men—6 years longer on average. That makes Social Security especially critical for women, since the program, unlike private savings, protects against the risks of outliving your savings and, certainly, ongoing rising inflation.

Privatizing Social Security would undercut many of the program's benefits for women, whether it is retirement security or the social insurance about which we spoke.

Taking trillions of dollars out of the Social Security trust fund will force a cut in these guaranteed benefits—25 percent or more, as I noted earlier, for current workers and 45 percent for those who enter the workforce later. That is unacceptable.

It will also undermine Social Security's role in the social insurance area, leaving women less protected against a variety of risks in our society.

I know many people around here are convinced that we need to cut Social Security benefits to make sure that Social Security meets its long-term financial objectives and its long-term financial needs to deal with those pressures. Most Americans do not believe that. I want you to know, I do not believe that. We can save Social Security without cutting it. The truth is, the American people are right. It is a matter of our priorities.

Consider these two figures: First, the long-term Social Security shortfall is $3.7 trillion. It is about $74 billion a year if you factor it out over the 75-year actuarial life we are talking about. The long-term cost of last year's tax cut is $8.7 trillion over the same period. Remember, $3.7 trillion to fix Social Security; $8.7 trillion in our tax cuts. In other words, the tax cut will cost more than twice as much as the entire Social Security shortfall.

I don't get it. Where are our priorities? What is important? I hope my colleagues will remember that the next time someone says we have no choice but to cut benefits, that they will put that into the framework of what we need to be thinking about as we deal with fiscal policy in this country.

We certainly could, and should, consider—this is a personal view—postponing some of the remaining tax cuts to deal with Social Security's fiscal needs first. That is a priority. Social Security should come first.

Last week, as I said, I attended a press conference with the leaders of OWL, a grassroots membership organization that focuses on the needs of midlife and older women. OWL developed an excellent report called "Social Security Privatization: A False Promise for Women." I sent copies to every Senator's office, and I hope my colleagues will take a look at it. There are individual stories inside this excellent report. There are details about how the financial structure of Social Security works. It is a composite that pulls together an overview.

It makes in clear and compelling terms the case that privatizing Social Security would be extraordinarily bad for women. They do that on a personal level, they do it on an analytical level, and they do it in ways and terms that I believe the American people can understand.

That is the message all women and all Americans must understand and debate before the election. We need to understand what is going on with the Bush recommendations. We need to understand what will happen if we follow and implement those recommendations.

I believe we ought to be looking for ways of strengthening Social Security. We can deal with some of those from a fiscal policy standpoint, but we need to strengthen Social Security, not cut benefits. We need to deal with how we look at women's participation in the workforce and the calculation of their benefits.

We ought to be getting on with that debate now, before the elections. After all, I repeat, the future of Social Security is too important to be decided behind closed doors. This is an issue that affects all Americans—the financial security of all Americans, and particularly the financial security of women. Let's get on with that debate. Let's have that debate.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the executive summary of the OWL report be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

SOCIAL SECURITY AND WOMEN

The Social Security system is an embodiment of the long-standing American principle of social insurance, providing nearly universal coverage for workers and their families through a pooling of resources benefits, and risk.

One-third of the program's beneficiaries are not retirees but include children, widows, and people with disabilities. Social Security offers an unmatchable set of insurance protections for workers and their families, providing protection against poverty in the event of death, disability or old age.

Women comprise the majority of Social Security beneficiaries, representing 58 percent of all Social Security recipients at age 65 and 71 percent of all recipients by age 85.

Accounting for more than 70 percent of older adults living in poverty, women are more vulnerable in retirement. During this time they most need the stability of a guaranteed source of income—the Social Security check. Without it, 52 percent of white women, 65 of African American women, and 61 percent of Latinas over the age 65 would be poor.

WOMEN'S REALITIES AND RETIREMENT CONSEQUENCES

For women, poverty in old age is often rooted in the realities that shaped their lives early on: the reality of the wage gap, the reality of caregiving, and the reality of flexible jobs that offer few benefits, especially pensions.

Almost 40 years after the Equal Pay Act was passed, women still earn only 73 percent of what men earn. You can't save what you don't earn.

Caregiving directly affects women's retirement security, as they often take more flexible, lower-wage jobs with few benefits or stop working altogether in order to provide unpaid caregiving services. In fact, women spend, on average, 12 years out of the work force for family caregiving over the course of their lives.

Older women are less likely than older men to receive pension income (28 percent of 43 percent); when they do, the benefit is only about half the benefit men receive.

Women live an average of six years longer than men. Women's longer lifespans make them more vulnerable to the impact of inflation and to the risk that they will outlive their money.

THE GREAT SOLVENCY DEBATE

Social Security is a "pay-as-you-go" system. Current workers not only see the societal and family benefits of supporting our nation's vulnerable seniors, but also know that they are covered by the same set of social insurance protections.

Changing demographics mean that the system will eventually have to use trust fund dollars to cover out-going benefits. This situation was predicted and addressed by Congress in 1983, when it adjusted the system to build up the trust fund for the retirement of the baby boomers.

The trust fund consists of U.S. Treasury bonds, considered the safest investment vehicle available to individual or institutional investors worldwide.

Experts do have suggestions about how to plan for a potential financing shortfall. There are many proposals that preserve the integrity of the program while shoring it up for the future. These stand in stark contrast to private accounts, which would speed insolvency and destroy the social insurance compact that is Social Security.

Mr. CORZINE. I thank the Chair.

Madam President, I know this is an issue that is near and dear to your heart. It is an issue to which it is absolutely essential we pay attention and debate, that we get to a conclusion that supports America's women, making sure they have retirement security commensurate with the rest of Americans.

I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. Madam President, first, I commend Senator CORZINE for the leadership role he is taking in trying to protect Social Security for all Americans. Today we are particularly focusing on the Social Security needs and concerns of women, but the effort is a much broader one. It is to protect Social Security from the recommendations of the President's Commission on Social Security which would lead to a lessening of the security, would make it less of a social instrument, and leave it more up to the whims of the stock market, which may or may not go up, which may or may not, therefore, lead to more funds in the hands of people who own private accounts but, overall, would make this Nation and its seniors and people who are about to become seniors, in their forties and fifties, a lot less secure.

A week ago a report was released by the National Older Women's League, or OWL, to commemorate Mother's Day. It was an appropriate day to release this report. The report shows the problems that would be created if the recommendations of that President's Commission were adopted. It is entitled "Social Security Privatization: A False Promise for Women." I encourage every Member of this body to read this report. It clearly demonstrates that the recommendations of the President's Social Security Commission are a bad deal for Americans and particularly bad for women.

Currently, women comprise 58 percent of Social Security beneficiaries over the age of 65 and 71 percent of those over the age of 85. Women depend on Social Security more than men, despite their increasing presence in today's workforce. Women earn less than men: 73 cents on every dollar a man earns.

These statistics indicate that changes to the Social Security system that result in reduced benefits will have a negative disparate impact on women.

The President's Commission is based on privatization plans that would divert Social Security payroll taxes into individually owned private accounts, shifting the system from shared risk and collective gain among workers to private accounts that would leave workers to sink or swim on their own.

This concept would have a particularly negative effect on women for several reasons. Private accounts ask women to bear more of a risk because of their increased dependency. Private accounts would undermine the social insurance nature of Social Security. Private accounts cost more to administer. Private accounts may speed up Social Security insolvency.

By most accounts, Social Security is the most dependable source of retirement security for a majority of women. Privatization takes that reliability and that dependability and gambles the financial future of women and all seniors on the volatility of the stock market. America's seniors, and in particular women, deserve better than that.

Women account for more than 70 percent of older Americans living in poverty. Without Social Security, 52 percent of white women, 65 percent of African-American women, and 61 percent of Hispanic women over the age of 65 would be poor. These alarming statistics and the OWL Mother's Day report are an eye-opening experience for all of us.

The President's Commission takes the fundamental principles of Social Security and abandons them for a market-driven scheme that is unreliable at best and discriminatory at worst. Social Security is an entitlement program based on the concept of social insurance. It is not supposed to be a gamble which pays benefits based on how the stock market did yesterday or last year or tomorrow or next year.

Women live an average of 6 years longer than men and, as a result, women are more likely to outlive the benefits of private accounts. In addition, older women are three times as likely to lose their spouse.

We should protect this program, we should make the changes we need to ensure its solvency, and we should not overhaul it or undermine its basic principles by eroding the social insurance components, as the President's Commission would have us do.

Yesterday on the Senate floor, Senator BINGAMAN commented that retirement security is a three-legged stool, with one leg representing Social Security, one leg representing pensions, and the final leg representing personal savings and investment. I could not agree more. We should not take the President's Commission recommendations and blur the lines between Social Security and private investments.

I commend the OWL report because it shows that the detrimental effect Social Security privatization would have on women is severe, it is important, and it is relevant. I hope every Member of this body will take the time to read this report, to reflect on its findings as we contemplate the recommendations for structural changes to the Social Security program.

I yield the floor, and I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. CORZINE. Madam President, will the Senator from Michigan entertain a question?

Mr. LEVIN. I will be happy to.

Mr. CORZINE. Did I hear the Senator indicate that roughly 51 percent of women would be in poverty if we did not have a Social Security system?

Mr. LEVIN. The figure I used was 52 percent of white women and a larger percentage of African-American and Hispanic women.

Mr. CORZINE. If I am not mistaken—maybe the Senator from Michigan can refresh my memory—with Social Security we have something less than 10 percent of Americans now living out of poverty. That is what the whole design of the program was, to provide a fundamental foundation—"social insurance" I think was the term the Senator used. Is that the way the Senator from Michigan understands both the number and the reality of how it has worked?

Mr. LEVIN. The Social Security system, along with Medicare, is probably the reason that only, as I understand the number, 1 out of 20, about 5 percent, of seniors live in poverty. My number may be a little low. But the point is that 20 percent of American children live in poverty, and yet approximately 5 percent of seniors live in poverty. It is shameful that 20 percent of Americans live in poverty, but one of the main reasons a smaller number of seniors live in poverty than our kids is Social Security and Medicare. The Senator from New Jersey is exactly right.

Mr. CORZINE. We have a lot to do, if at least my analysis and others of the Social Security benefit cuts that are implied by the privatization process are implemented, for women, obviously, but Americans broadly and, quite frankly, a number of children because Social Security is a program for disability, spouses, and children survivors as well.

I was interested to hear the Senator talk about transaction costs and privatization. I remember recently we had a presentation by a Member of Congress at one of our briefings on Social Security. Did I recall hearing that there is a privatization scheme in Britain where 40 percent of the dollars that are allocated for savings in this privatized account go to transaction costs?

Mr. LEVIN. I think that was the number I heard. My memory is very similar to that. It is an astounding number that the people who recommend privatization don't even factor.

There are a lot of other things they don't factor, by the way; some of them are even more focused. They don't replace the money. They don't say how they will replace the money which would be lost to the Social Security system by people not contributing to it and supporting folks who are retired or near retirement. They never talk about that huge hole in the general fund that would be created. They don't talk about the uncertainty of private accounts as much as they should, the fact that the market over time may go up depending on what time period you look at, but not for everybody.

Even within that long window, there will be some losers. Maybe most people will win, but what about the losers? They don't talk about that as much as they should. The thing they never talk about are these administrative costs, these transaction costs which, as the Senator has pointed out, are apparently a very significant percentage of the money.

Mr. CORZINE. If the Senator from Michigan will give me the grace of making sure my arithmetic is right, if you add a 25-percent cut for people who are now working plus 40 percent in administrative costs, that 65 percent out of the total amount of benefits from Social Security seems to be a big chunk out of how one would have their retirement financed. Certainly it would go a long way to eroding the base of benefits that people have come to expect from Social Security.

Mr. LEVIN. It would, indeed. It makes that enticement of private accounts, when you analyze it, a lot more superficial. The reality is a lot more negative than that superficial glow of riches.

Mr. DAYTON. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. LEVIN. Sure.

Mr. DAYTON. Contrary to what most people in this country probably believe, the Social Security Administration is extremely efficient, and, in fact, less than 1 percent of Social Security goes for administrative costs. The Senator cited some of the figures from the OWL report, which is an excellent document, about the disparities between men and women. I have seen the statistic that one-quarter of the retirees in America today don't receive any pension fund whatsoever.

My experience in Minnesota would be that probably 80 or 90 percent of those are women, particularly older women who are widowed and often, with the older pensions, lose any benefit payments whatsoever once their husband dies. I wonder if the Senator from Michigan has had that same experience. Would the Senator say in Michigan that number applies?

Mr. LEVIN. It is a very large percentage. I don't have it directly in my mind, but it is a large percentage of people, particularly women, who rely exclusively on Social Security. We encourage people, of course, to have private savings, and some people have pensions. That three-legged stool Senator BINGAMAN talked about of Social Security and private pensions and private savings is a one-leg stool for a large percentage of our seniors and a larger percentage of women.

Mr. DAYTON. The Senator is absolutely right. That is exactly the dilemma, the predicament in which so many elderly women find themselves. There is only one leg to that stool. As the Senator from New Jersey pointed out, with the average Social Security payment for women being only $750 a month. that is not much money on which to live. I think that creates part of the lure of the personal privatization which the Republican Commission has now come forward with, which, obviously, someone receiving that little amount of money would be tempted, enticed by something else. As the Senator pointed out very well, there is no reward without risk.

I wonder if the Senator—certainly the Senator from New Jersey who spent a career in financial pursuits—is aware of anywhere where there is that potential for reward in the private sector without commensurate risk.

Mr. LEVIN. There will be winners and losers. It turns Social Security into a social insecurity system.

Mr. DAYTON. I compliment the Senator from New Jersey in bringing this important report to the Senate. He is to be commended. It is a very important topic, as we look ahead to the future of Social Security.

Mr. LEVIN. One last word: I have met with the women who are active in the OWL commission. They are very keenly aware of the problems with the President's Commission and the uncertainties it would create for women in particular who are seniors. And I think the opposition to the President's Commission's findings is very strong and is growing.

Mr. CORZINE. Will the Senator from Michigan yield for a moment to say, I am very appreciative of the discussion you have had, the contributions the Senator from Minnesota made with regard to raising this issue so we can have a debate about it. This debate ought to be had before the election, not after the election. People ought to have to make a statement about how they feel about these recommendations since it has such an impact on Americans lives, particularly women in America. That is what the OWL report was about. I very much appreciate the contributions my colleagues have made to this discussion.

Mr. LEVIN. One additional word: I hope we will actually not only consider the recommendations of the President's Commission but actually vote on them. We ought to put them to rest. There is a lot of concern in the country about those recommendations, that they would totally make the Social Security system much less secure. I think we ought to try to address the concerns by voting on those recommendations. I believe they will be voted down, as they should be, so that the people out there who are not only retired but in their forties and fifties, who rely on Social Security, want it to be there, don't want the uncertainty that will be created by the contributions being reduced—which is what would happen without any idea of where the replacement funds would come from—I think it would be healthy for the country not just to debate it but, if possible, before the election to vote up or down on those recommendations. I hope and believe that all of them will be rejected.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Time for morning business is closed.

ANDEAN TRADE PREFERENCE EXPANSION ACT—Resumed

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume consideration of H.R. 3009, which the clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 3009) to extend the Andean Trade Preference Act, to grant additional trade benefits under that Act, and for other purposes.

Pending:

Baucus/Grassley amendment No. 3401, in the nature of a substitute.

Baucus amendment No. 3405 (to amendment No. 3401), to clarify the principal negotiating objectives of the United States with respect to foreign investment.

AMENDMENT NO. 3405

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be 10 minutes debate in relation to the pending Baucus amendment. Who yields time?

The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BAUCUS. Madam President, is there a time allotted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There will be 10 minutes debate in relation to the pending Baucus amendment.

Mr. BAUCUS. It is my understanding that the Senator from Massachusetts will have 5 minutes and the other 5 minutes will be allotted to Senator GRASSLEY and myself. I will take 2½ minutes of that.

I rise once again to urge my colleagues to support the amendment that

I laid down yesterday on behalf on myself and Senators GRASSLEY and WYDEN.

The amendment is a short but very important clarification to the trade bill's negotiating objective on investment. when we negotiate investment agreements, our primary objective is to ensure that U.S. investors abroad have rights and protections comparable to the rights and protections they enjoy in the United States. In fulfilling that objective, we generally undertake reciprocal obligations with respect to foreign investors.

Our amendment makes absolutely clear that the rights we extend to foreign investors must not exceed the rights we afford our own citizens.

I expect that this is not the end of our debate on investor-state dispute settlement. As the debate goes forward, it is important to understand that we are trying to achieve a balance. In taking steps to protect U.S. investors abroad, we must not sacrifice the sovereignty of Federal, State, and local governments here at home. Striking the right balance is precisely what we have done in the trade bill. When it was brought to our attention that we might improve that balance, we did so in the amendment laid down yesterday.

In the days ahead, it is important that we not upend the balance. We have carefully crafted a foundation for future investment agreements. I strongly urge my colleagues to support that foundation and to support the Baucus-Grassley-Wyden amendment.

I reserve the remainder of my 2½ minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KERRY. Madam President, I appreciate enormously the efforts of the chairman and ranking member to move what is always a very difficult issue through the Senate. They have done a good job of trying to resolve a great many issues. I don't oppose this amendment of theirs, but, in fact, I urge my colleagues to vote for the amendment.

I emphasize to my colleagues that this amendment does not fix the chapter 11 problem that still exists with respect to the sovereignty of American businesses and the rights of Americans and of our communities to be able to be protected. I am very grateful for the chairman's willingness to try to respond, but substantial disagreements still exist with respect to how we best protect American businesses and our communities, according to our rights.

As our colleagues know, it is clear that the NAFTA investor-State dispute resolution process, which is known as chapter 11, is going to be the model on which future agreements are predicated. And chapter 11, in its current form, is a flawed model. It is not a failed model; it is simply flawed. We have the ability to be able to fix it.

Last night, Senator BAUCUS referenced letters written by several organizations that urged correction of the no-lesser-rights language, which is precisely what will happen in this particular amendment. I appreciate his response, but let me point out that in those letters he referenced, there are a whole set of other issues that are unaddressed in this amendment. Specifically, from the National League of Cities, they say: We are concerned that future trade negotiations, particularly for a hemispheric free trade area of the Americas, could include provisions that expand the definition of a regulatory taking. As evidenced by disputes under chapter 11 of NAFTA, vague expropriation language has allowed new avenues of recourse for foreign investors to challenge current State and local ordinances.

So we are allowing a foreign investor to come in and actually undo the intent of our local and State communities to enforce certain kinds of health or other kinds of restraints.

From the National Association of Towns and Townships:

> In particular, we are troubled that a claim by a foreign company that a local government's regulation or zoning laws constitutes a taking against the company will make it impossible for the locality to enforce that law or regulation.

From the National Conference of State Legislators:

> The bill does not adequately and explicitly guarantee that trade agreements negotiated under this authority will respect State sovereignty, nor incorporate well defined and constitutional Fifth Amendment takings principles.

Regrettably, the Baucus-Grassley amendment does not, despite what they claim in the no-greater-rights-than language, address the shortcomings of the chapter 11 model. Adopting their language without other needed changes is still going to allow future chapter 11-like tribunals to rule against legitimate U.S. public health and safety laws using a standard of expropriation that goes well beyond the clear standard that the Supreme Court has established in all of its expropriation cases.

The amendment before us does not give assurances that the due process claims of the Constitution will be respected, nor does it provide safe harbor for legitimate U.S. public health and safety laws.

I will propose an amendment, and we will debate this amendment over the course of the next couple of days. I urge my colleagues to adopt a policy that will fully protect the constitutional rights of American businesses and the constitutional right of our States, the expropriation laws and standards of the Supreme Court. I urge them to vote for this amendment recognizing this does not complete the task.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Madam President, the amendment that is before us was introduced by Senator BAUCUS and myself and is designed to make it crystal clear that in pursuing these objectives, foreign investors are not to be granted any greater rights in the United States than our own U.S. investors have rights within the United States. This provision builds upon the already strong improvements to the investment objectives within this bill. These provisions strike a very careful balance between the needs to protect U.S. citizens from arbitrary takings of their property overseas and the need to ensure that the investor-State dispute settlement process is not abused.

Critics of the investment provisions insist that the investor-State dispute settlement process has somehow run amok. Not true. The fact is that no U.S. environmental, health, or safety regulations have ever been overturned by the international investment arbitration. Only 13 investor-State claims have been filed under NAFTA chapter 11 in the entire 8 years of its existence. Meanwhile, U.S. investors continue to face discriminatory and arbitrary government action in most of the developing world. We need to maintain U.S. investors' ability to get redress in impartial tribunals while ensuring that the investor-State dispute settlement process continues to protect our own investors overseas. This simply is what the Baucus-Grassley amendment does.

I urge support for this amendment and support for the Baucus-Grassley compromise.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BAUCUS. Madam President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time is yielded back.

Mr. BAUCUS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There appears to be a sufficient second.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. REID. I announce that the Senator from Georgia (Mr. MILLER) is necessarily absent.

Mr. NICKLES. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) is necessarily absent.

I further announce that if present and voting the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) would vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. REED). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 3408

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Minnesota is recognized to offer an amendment.

Mr. DAYTON. I call up amendment No. 3408.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAYTON], for himself and Mr. CRAIG, proposes an amendment numbered 3408 to amendment No. 3401.

Mr. DAYTON. I ask unanimous consent the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

(Purpose: To limit the application of trade authorities procedures)

At the end of section 2103(b), add the following:

(4) LIMITATIONS ON TRADE AUTHORITIES PROCEDURES.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the provisions of section 151 of the Trade Act of 1974 (trade authorities procedures) shall not apply to any provision in an implementing bill being considered by the Senate that modifies or amends, or requires a modification of, or an amendment to, any law of the United States that provides safeguards from unfair foreign trade practices to United States businesses or workers, including—

(i) imposition of countervailing and antidumping duties (title VII of the Tariff Act of 1930; 19 U.S.C. 1671 et seq.);

(ii) protection from unfair methods of competition and unfair acts in the importation of articles (section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930; 19 U.S.C. 1337);

(iii) relief from injury caused by import competition (title II of the Trade Act of 1974; 19 U.S.C. 2251 et seq.);

(iv) relief from unfair trade practices (title III of the Trade Act of 1974; 19 U.S.C. 2411 et seq.); or

(v) national security import restrictions (section 232 of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962; 19 U.S.C. 1862).

(B) POINT OF ORDER IN SENATE.—

(i) IN GENERAL.—When the Senate is considering an implementing bill, upon a point of order being made by any Senator against any part of the implementing bill that contains material in violation of subparagraph (A), and the point of order is sustained by the Presiding Officer, the part of the implementing bill against which the point of order is sustained shall be stricken from the bill.

(ii) WAIVERS AND APPEALS.—

(I) WAIVERS.—Before the Presiding Officer rules on a point of order described in clause (i), any Senator may move to waive the point of order and the motion to waive shall not be subject to amendment. A point of order described in clause (i) is waived only by the affirmative vote of a majority of the Members of the Senate, duly chosen and sworn.

(II) APPEALS.—After the Presiding Officer rules on a point of order under this subparagraph, any Senator may appeal the ruling of the Presiding Officer on the point of order as it applies to some or all of the provisions on which the Presiding Officer ruled. A ruling of the Presiding Officer on a point of order described in clause (i) is sustained unless a majority of the Members of the Senate, duly chosen and sworn, vote not to sustain the ruling.

(III) DEBATE.—Debate on a motion to waive under subclause (I) or on an appeal of the ruling of the Presiding Officer under subclause (II) shall be limited to 1 hour. The time shall be equally divided between, and controlled by, the majority leader and the minority leader, or their designees.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk as a second-degree amendment, for Senator BAUCUS and myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRASSLEY] proposes an amendment numbered 3409 to amendment No. 3408.

Mr. GRASSLEY. I ask unanimous consent the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I have sent a second-degree amendment to the desk in place of the Dayton amendment. I am going to debate that in just a little while, but I want everybody to know the situation.

Also, Senator BAUCUS and I are going to visit with various people to see if there is a smooth way of handling both the substitute as well as the original amendment. We may not be successful, but that is our desire. We are going to be talking while this debate is ongoing, and I will be back to give the specifics of my amendment in just a short period of time.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. President, the amendment Senator CRAIG and I have introduced is one that I think has great importance to this legislation. It is one I am very proud to sponsor with the senior Senator from Idaho, someone with whom I have had the good fortune to work on this and other matters relating to trade as they affect our two States.

I also am very pleased that this amendment is cosponsored by 26 of our colleagues, 13 Republicans and 13 Democrats. They reflect a broad spectrum of views on many issues, yet they agree on the need for this amendment. Is it because all of us are against trade, as our detractors have charged?

The answer is an emphatic "no." We support this amendment because we recognize that there is more than one side to the U.S. trade equation. There are a great many citizens in our States who have benefited from the liberalization of international trade during the last 20 years. However, there are also a great many Americans who have been harmed by the results of recent trade agreements.

The proponents of more free trade acknowledge only the winners. Their reports cite only the businesses, the jobs, and the revenues from increased exports. Those benefits are substantial; however, they form only one side of the trade ledger. On the other side are thousands of bankrupt businesses and farms in the United States, many thousands of lost American jobs, and the massive shifting of U.S. production to other countries.

This Dayton-Craig amendment is on behalf of Americans who have been, are being, or will be harmed by continuing trade liberalization. They are hardworking citizens who nevertheless will lose their livelihoods, which in turn will cause lost homes, lost health insurance, lost pensions, lost retirement security, lost hope, and even lost lives. They are not isolated occurrences. They are growing in number across America.

They are victims of trade policies and trade practices which are out of balance. In the year 2000, the United States total trade deficit for goods and services was $376 billion. In goods alone, the deficit was $452 billion. In 1990, the total U.S. trade deficit was $81 billion. In 1980, it was only $19 billion. Our country's trade deficit, that imbalance between the value of our exports and the value of our imports, was 4½ times greater in 2000 than in 1990, and 20 times greater in 2000 than in 1980.

A March 18, 2002, Business Week article began:

> How much longer can the United States rack up giant current account trade deficits?

The article cited a Goldman Sachs Global Economic's Research report, which called the current trend "unsustainable."

Another recent report stated:

> America's ballooning trade deficit may be the worst economic problem we face—and no one wants to talk about it.

What is driving these soaring trade deficits? It isn't that U.S. exports are not expanding. In many sectors they are growing at a very strong rate, and the last administration worked hard to open foreign markets to U.S. goods and services, as did its predecessors. It's the explosion in imports which is far exceeding export gains.

From 1990 to 2000, total U.S. exports in goods and services almost doubled to just over $1 trillion. However, during that decade, total U.S. imports more than doubled—in fact, increased by 133 percent, to almost $1½ trillion. The increase in imports was $295 billion more than the growth in exports.

If you look at key sectors in our economy, you see this pattern. Exports expand. Imports explode. Trade deficits multiply. This serious imbalance has cost the jobs, farms, businesses, and livelihoods of too many Americans.

Even in agriculture, the growth in imports has exceeded the growth in exports. Farmers and national commodity organizations, including many coming right out of Minnesota, have been among the biggest supporters of trade liberalization in their hopes that increased exports would lead to higher prices and decent profits in the marketplace. From 1990 to 2000, total U.S. agriculture exports did grow by $10.5 billion, a 26-percent increase. However, agriculture imports increased by over $16 billion during that time. Today, the U.S. balance of trade in all agriculture commodities is still positive; however, that margin is shrinking.

Two major causes of our huge trade deficits have been Mexico and Canada. They are the big NAFTA winners. Look at what has happened to U.S. trade with our neighbors since NAFTA took effect on January 1, 1994.

In 1993, the last year before NAFTA, all United States exports to Mexico totaled $41.6 billion. Imports from Mexico totaled $39.9 billion, leaving the United States with a $1.7 billion trade surplus with Mexico.

During the next 7 years, United States exports into Mexico grew to $111 billion, a 167-percent in crease in 7 years. However, Mexican imports into the United States exploded to $136 billion, a 240-percent increase, and the United States balance of trade with Mexico went from its 1993 surplus to a $25 billion deficit in the year 2000.

Our trade with Canada followed a similar pattern. United States exports into Canada increased by $69 billion from 1993 to 2000. However, our imports from Canada grew by $120 billion, almost double the growth in exports. In 2000, our trade deficit with Canada was $52 billion.

Looking at one key sector, automobiles, the total automobile imports from Mexico into the United States more than tripled from 1993 to 2000, to almost 1 million per year. Cars imported from Canada into the United States increased by 56 percent during that time to 2.2 million automobiles. Those 3 million autos used to be—or could have been—manufactured in the United States by American auto workers.

Agriculture is another big loser under NAFTA, as too many Minnesota farmers have painfully realized. Canadian wheat, Mexican sugar, milk protein concentrate, stuffed molasses via Canada, and other trade imbalances have caused domestic commodity prices to plummet. The average price of a bushel of corn in the United States in the year 2000, was $1.85, well below the price of $3.11 for a bushel of corn in 1980, 20 years previously. For a bushel of wheat, the price in 2000 was $2.65 per bushel; in 1980 it was $3.91. For soybeans, a bushel in 2000 averaged $4.75; in 1980, that price was $7.57. Milk averaged $12.40 per cwt. in 2000, compared to $13.05 per cwt. in 1980. Turkeys brought 40.7 cents per pound in 2000; 41.3 cents per pound in 1980.

All of those prices are in current dollars. After adjusting for inflation, their drops are even more severe. Last year, the U.S. farm price index, the value of all U.S. agriculture products divided by the cost of producing them, dropped to its lowest level since the Great Depression. That index has fallen by 20 percent during the last 10 years. So much for the benefits of NAFTA and international trade liberalization on American agriculture.

Similarly, in the nonfarm private sector, the average hourly wage paid U.S. workers in real dollars was less in the year 2000 than in 1990. It was less in 2000 than it was in 1980, and less than it was in 1970. Only by more spouses working more hours have average American families stayed even or moved slightly ahead in the U.S. economy during the last 10, 20, and 30 years.

Thus, U.S. trade policies and practices, in balance, are doing many Americans more harm than good. And the harm is increasing more than the good.

The response of free trade proponents to this predicament is more free trade. More opening our doors to the largest marketplace in the world, the U.S.

economy, which still produces 23 percent of the world's GWP, accounts for 12 percent of world exports, and 18 percent of world imports.

Who, then, does benefit from this U.S. trade policy? Primarily, it has been, and continues to be, the enormous cost advantages afforded U.S. corporations who shift production out of the United States into low-wage low-cost countries. Deregulation of the world's product and financial markets has enriched a world class of investors, entrepreneurs, and professionals. At the very top, the accumulation of wealth has been extraordinary.

In 1996, the United Nations reported that the assets of the world's 350 billionaires—that is, 350 individuals in this world who are billionaires—exceeded the combined incomes of 45 percent of the world's population, almost 3 billion people.

Let me say that again. The assets of the wealthiest 350 people in the world exceeded the total assets of over 3 billion of our world's citizens. But the larger promise made by the proponents of this unregulated world marketplace—particularly to the people of the United States—was that living standards for the rest of Americans would also rise. That promise has not been realized. As trade and financial markets have been flung open, incomes have risen not faster, but more slowly. Income equality among nations has not improved, and within nations, including the United States, income inequality has worsened.

But this seems not to matter to the promoters of this rapid deregulation of the global economy, the so-called neoliberals, and their solution to whatever problems afflict us is, of course, more trade liberalization. Ironically, many of them spent the last 30 years associating the word "liberal" with social failure. In this instance, they may prove themselves correct.

Nevertheless, it is the considered judgment of this administration and of the House of Representatives, albeit by a single vote, to continue in that direction. I expect this body will join with them by passing this trade promotion authority legislation.

Thus, the Dayton-Craig amendment represents one of the last opportunities for Congress to assert its priority for the economic well-being of the American people over the capital-serving efficiencies of liberalized world markets. This amendment preserves Congress' ability to look out for the best interests of all Americans, especially the people who are on the losing side of the trade equation. And if we don't look out for them, it is a near certainty that no one else will.

The Dayton-Craig amendment applies only to so-called trade remedy laws. They were enacted and put into law by previous Congresses and Presidents to protect American business owners, workers, and farmers from illegal or unfair trade practices, and to assist those Americans whose lives and livelihoods were irrevocably damaged by them. These trade remedy laws include safeguards in section 201, which provide for temporary duties, quotas, or other restrictions on imports that are traded fairly but which threaten serious injury to a domestic industry. They include anti-dumping remedies for the destructive effects of imports sold on the U.S. market at unfairly low prices, and countervailing duty relief from the negative impact of imports receiving foreign government subsidies. They also include section 301 of the Trade Act which authorizes the United States Trade Representative to investigate trade agreement violations and illegal foreign trade barriers which are harmful to U.S. businesses and exports, and to remedy those violations.

All of these remedies are already subject to the rules established under the World Trade Organization and under the North American Free Trade Agreement. The United States and other WTO members must adhere to the Uruguay Round Stipulations on subsidies and countervailing measures. This is hugely important. This is the first time the United States has ever agreed to subjugate its sovereignty to an international organization. The folks who decried the Trilateral Commission and so-called one-world government, those who condemn the coordination of U.S. military forces with NATO, and those who oppose any U.S. adherence to international agreements, are strangely silent about U.S. subjugation to the economic dictates of the World Trade Organization. Heretofore, the WTO, has operated largely as the creation of the United States that it is. However, now that it is fully established and empowered with the unanimous consent of the participating countries and whose rules can only be altered by the same, any sovereign powers negotiated away in future trade agreements that are agreed to by this body will not be redeemable, which is all the more reason why Congress should be vigilant over them.

The Dayton-Craig amendment says that Congress, along with the President, enacted these trade remedy laws, and only the President and Congress may eliminate them. They cannot be negotiated away by an unelected trade negotiator, albeit one selected by the President, who has a much narrower perspective than Congress, who has the specific objective to secure further trade agreements, and who may not share this body's perspective and concerns. Since a letter from 62 Senators opposing the inclusion of trade remedy laws in future trade negotiations was ignored, there is no reason to expect otherwise when those negotiations finally occur.

So, when a new trade agreement comes to Congress, to the Senate, with the trade remedy laws of the United States altered, with their protections weakened, and with Congress' prior enactment of them overridden, then, if this trade promotion authority law is in effect—as it is written now without the Craig-Dayton amendment—we will be faced with a take it or leave it proposition. We will have no discretion or latitude. It will be all or nothing.

This amendment will permit—not require, but permit—Congress to separate those provisions in a proposed new trade agreement which alter existing trade remedy laws, allow the rest of the agreement to proceed along fast track, and then consider those trade remedy changes under regular Senate rules and procedures. Then, Congress can decide, as only Congress should decide, whether they must be given up for some larger gain. Then, we, or our successors, will be able to look our constituents in their eyes and tell them that we have acted in their collective best interests.

Trade negotiators look at those trade remedy laws and they see words, or bargaining chips, or perhaps even nuisances to get rid of. We see people, our constituents, who elected us and who depend upon us to look out for their interests. So when words which protect them are going to be removed, those decisions should be reviewed by their elected Representatives.

Last week, the trade ambassador said that you cannot be for this amendment and be for trade. There is great irony in an unelected official in the executive branch, which has no constitutional authority over trade, telling 535 elected Members of Congress, to whom the Constitution assigns the full responsibility for foreign trade, essentially to butt out of his domain. He was quoted as saying:

> This goes to the heart, of whether the Congress is going to try to negotiate with 435 Members of the House and 100 Senators, whether they want to go over to Brussels and all sit around together, or whether they are going to have the Executive Branch negotiate.

My reply, Mr. Ambassador, is: You negotiate and then Congress will exercise its responsibilities under the United States Constitution. If our trading partners question those procedures, show them a copy of our Constitution. We bring government officials from all over the world here to learn about our system of government. This is another teaching opportunity. Under our Constitution, we do not permit one person—no matter who he or she is—to bargain away our laws. No one—not even the President of the United States—has that authority. And no one who understands our Constitution should seek that authority.

While our country's future trade policies are debatable, the right of Congress to participate actively in setting those policies is not. For anyone to try to usurp that authority is seriously misguided. If it succeeds, Congress has failed, failed its responsibility, failed the Constitution, and failed the people of America.

By adopting this amendment, the Senate upholds that right and that responsibility.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, as a cosponsor of the Dayton-Craig amendment, I wish to speak for a few moments about the constructs of the amendment itself and applaud my colleague and partner in this amendment, the Senator from Minnesota, for a very thorough and well-thought-out explanation as to the reason for this amendment.

I need not repeat the statistics. I need not repeat the facts that have been so eloquently spoken about a problem that exists in our country today that begs for a remedy and, at the same time, demands that we move forward in the area of expanding trade amongst our trading partners around the world.

The elements of fairness, the elements of transparency, the elements of the right hand knowing what the left hand is doing are absolutely critical in any trade relationship.

By the character of a developing economy, by the uniqueness of a resource-directed economy, by the uniqueness of a populated economy, all of our countries around the world have differences. And those differences have values. And those countries that sense those values work to protect them or in some way assure that they will not be traded down or effectively destroyed by the very governments that are destined to protect them.

As a result of that, from the very beginning, and from the beginning of the debate over trade, very substantively coming with the Kennedy Round of trade years ago, when we first established the fast-track concept, we knew our trade negotiators, once they were at the table of international negotiations, would have to have flexibility to propose and bring back to the Congress a whole package. But that whole package had to be representative of the laws of the country of which they were diplomats.

We have struggled with that over the years. Congress has consistently passed fast tracks, and we have worked to move progressively and to liberalize our trade laws. We, the United States, have been the world's promoters of trade. It is quite simple why we would want to be that.

In my State of Idaho, nearly a third of every acre planted of agricultural produce has to sell in world markets to maintain some degree of value in a domestic market.

My State was built on potatoes, potato chips. Now it is being built on computer chips. And those products have to sell in world markets. Clearly, the DRAMs that are produced by Micron, a large portion of those move into international markets to be applied to new technologies being developed in those markets that then again sell in the world market.

Clearly, in my State, trade has expanded dramatically in the last several decades. But while the hi-tech economy has grown very well with a substantial amount of profitability, the agricultural economy has floundered. And while trade has been extremely beneficial in some areas, I would have to argue, as the Senator from Minnesota has, that in other areas it appears to have been less than fair and, in many instances, not fair at all.

There is a bit of a classic struggle going on between the United States and Canada in our forest products industries, forest products industries that are in part supply, publicly owned in the sense that the timber comes from public lands. Whether it is the Federal lands of the U.S. Forest Service in the lower 48 and Alaska or whether it is crowned and provincial timber in Canada, the reality of placing values on those rough products as they move to the market is substantially different.

Over the years we have fought mightily to create balance. But as a result of some of what we believed to be unfair practices between Canada and the United States, we have seen the rights of our policies go out and our men and women walk away with empty lunch pails while Canadians were aggressively logging and dumping in our markets. Just this year our President had to use trade remedy laws to stop the very process I have just defined. He stood up and he spoke out and he placed a tariff against Canadian lumber until such time as they can come back to the table and balance out with us a relationship and an agreement that does not put our men and women out of work and still allows them to work and still allows the beneficial reality of Canadian and U.S. sticks, 2 by 4s, being at the local lumberyard to build the homes of Americans.

That is called balanced trade. That is called fair trade. The 201 process that brought about the investigation by our government, which was open and transparent, and that led our President to move is known as a trade remedy law passed by the U.S. Congress, passed by a majority vote out of this body—in other words, reflective of the constitutional responsibility of every Senator and every U.S. Member of Congress representing their States but, most importantly, taking an oath right there in that well to uphold the Constitution of the United States.

The argument is simple and the argument has been made already today by the administration in a letter to all of our colleagues that fast track is simply a process and we make all of these proposals and we make all of these changes and all of them come back for a vote in this Chamber and they are correct—one vote, up or down.

The problem occurs with the anticipation of the positives that will happen in an overall trade package once negotiated because they are never quite negotiated in a vacuum. The process goes on for years and years, as you have round after round and finally they conclude; there is a lot of attention and the world finally says, Oh, here it is, here is a trade package, a product of WTO, a product of aggressive negotiations, probably a product of the new round launched last year in Doha. The anticipation is so great and the public pressure is so great that when it gets to the well of the Senate and we see that substantive law has been changed and we would like to fix it, we cannot. We can vote against it, but the pressure by business, by industry, by the economy in general is you must pass this trade package. And we do. And we have consistently.

As a result, some of us have had to vote no. I voted no against NAFTA. Why? Because of some environmental provisions in it and because of loopholes that I felt were in it, that an 18-wheeler truckload with Canadian grain could get through and into our markets were a reality, and they were and I voted against it, and time has proven that to be the case.

But it has also proven one other thing—that Canadians are very good at enforcing laws at the border and we are very bad. But that was then. This is now. This administration is acting differently, and it is acting responsibly, and it led with the steel decision and it has now followed with the softwood lumber decision, and it is saying that it will effectively use a very transparent process to review the fairness or the lack of fairness in trade relationships and where it finds dumping it will move. And it has. I credit them for that.

But what I am also saying, what the Senator from Minnesota is saying is that within the process itself, we can avoid some of the problems that have now been recorded over the last several decades if we would be allowed, on laws that we are proposing to be changed that might reduce the ability of the executive branch of our Government to enforce trade remedy laws, to say that they would apply to a point of order and a simple majority vote, the same vote it takes to pass the trade package that would be in the Chamber that they would be a part of. So I would say to any negotiator, if you are negotiating a package that cannot get 51 votes in this Chamber, and you are proposing changes in substantive law that might be required to get 51 votes, wherein lies the problem, especially if we are defending what I believe to be the very thing that the Senator from Minnesota has talked about—our constitutional responsibility and the sovereignty in doing that.

Every administration and this administration protects with a vengeance its executive prerogatives, its executive authority, and we have seen this administration step up to that on at least two occasions in the last couple of years. That is what we are doing today—stepping up to what is, in fact, a legislative prerogative of the Constitution and why we think it is right that it be allowed to be a part of this package requiring a simple majority vote.

What am I saying? The Dayton-Craig amendment is simply a point of order that would be part of it. That is, if a package comes to the floor and there are changes in trade remedy law—and in the current package that we are alleging we will know if they are there without even having to look because 90 days prior, under the law proposed, the negotiators would have to announce proposals of changes in the law. That is part of what came out of the House. That is part of what the Finance Committee, Chairman BAUCUS and Senator GRASSLEY agreed on. And that is appropriate. It is appropriate that the legislative bodies of this constitutional Republic understand that changes in the laws that they have written are being proposed. What we are saying today is that there ought to be the next step and that next step is quite simple—to allow a simple majority vote of the constitutional officers of this body—us, U.S. Senators—to say whether those changes are right.

Now, here is the next step, though: but to do so without dragging the whole trade package down. Not all trade packages are changes in our laws. They are expansions of authority. They are access to other markets. They are adjustments in other laws—ours and theirs, our trading partners. And so we are saying you do not bring down the whole package; there is good in trade and we know that. But what we are saying is that there is an authority and a responsibility that we should not abrogate or that we should not cast in such a way as to never be able to get there because the value of the whole appears to be so much greater and so important at that moment in time than the long-term constitutional responsibility of these Senators.

So the Senators from Minnesota and Idaho, pass go, because the whole is so much more important than the parts. We are here today to tell you that the parts are darned important. They are constitutionally important.

And now let me try to set another stage for you about the pressures involved.

Our trade remedy process, countervailing duty, antidumping, 201 is transparent. It is a public process. If you, Mr. President, are a manufacturer in your State and you feel you are being dramatically harmed by a product coming in under a trade agreement, you have a course of action. Now, it takes a couple of years. It is open, it is public, and it will cost you money because you will have to get the attorneys and you will have to make the argument. If it is dramatic dumping and dramatic competition, you might be out of business before you get a remedy, but the remedy is still there and it is still open and it is still public. What we have tried to do and what our negotiators have tried to do since the Kennedy round forward is to convince other countries of the world to make their processes more transparent.

Now, over time, there has been a shift. The shift has been away from their duties and away from their penalties toward antidumping provisions, not unlike ours. They are not transparent. Sometimes they are cast or administered in the dark of night. And so what our trading partners are telling our trade negotiators, or at least our trade negotiators believe, is that we have to get rid of what we have to cause them to get rid of what they are getting or they have got as it relates to trade remedy laws. In other words, we walk the plank first and maybe they will follow. In the meantime, what happens to the manufacturers and the workers? What happens to the economies of Idaho and Minnesota? Do they have to shift to the new paradigm? Do the old economies have to go away even though under a different day and a different scenario they were viable and productive? Well, I guess I am frustrated by it all.

Let me talk about what happened in November of 2001 at Doha, Qatar, when our trade negotiators were involved in a round that we worked very hard to get, that was a product of the fallout of the very tragic round that occurred in Seattle, which basically fell apart as a result of national and international dissidents and disruption. In Doha this past November, our administration agreed to reopen negotiations on agreements of implementation of article 5 of the GATT—that is called on antidumping and countervailing duties—and on subsidies and countervailing pressures. The World Trade Organization had already ruled a number of times against our domestic trade remedy laws under these agreements and stated: the stated purpose of almost every other WTO member in securing these new negotiations is to further weaken U.S. trade law; in other words, further weaken the ability of the U.S. Government to protect its work force and its producers and its industries from what might be dumping, what might be clearly antitrade or unfair trade.

The Japanese Government was elated by that action. They said: We are satisfied. This constitutes a major victory for their efforts to gut our trade laws. Those are the words of the Japanese economy, trade and industry minister. He said: "We are 120 percent satisfied that that's where the Bush administration wants to go."

The USTR sacrificed our antidumping and countervailing duty laws in order to get a new round of talks at the table—not yet; they simply put them on the table.

Now, here is where I think the Senator from Minnesota and I agree and we also agree with our Trade Ambassador. There is nothing wrong with putting those issues on the table. When you are sitting at a negotiating table, everything ought to be negotiable, if the goal is to move from here to here and the benefits that will accrue as a result of that proposal are positive for our economies. So, our Trade Ambassador, put it on the table.

But in putting it on the table, it is important that you recognize who made those laws and how we ultimately ought to address them. And what we are saying is, put them on the table; talk about them. See if there is a better way to get where we need to go in 2002 than there was in 1960. The world has changed dramatically. We understand that. We are willing to listen to it. Put it on the table. The laws we passed in 1960 may not apply today.

But in putting it on the table, we are simply saying: And you bring back proposed changes in current law, not new law, in current trade remedy laws that are subject to a point of order. Why? Because this sovereign body created those laws. And the executive branch of government does not have a right to change them. And they don't. They only propose changes, but they do so in an environment that almost always assures that never will that vote occur.

It is a rather simple approach. We are being told by the administration and by some in it that this destroys TPA. It has been editorialized that this is a bitter pill. Then the other day it was called a torpedo. Today, in what is a well-meaning but not totally accurate letter from the administration, they strongly opposed it.

Let me go through the letter in the context of what I have just talked about, about the flexibility of negotiations. Before I do that, let me drop back a moment to something I think is important, and it is a frustration that our negotiators deal with when they are in the business of negotiating.

I had the opportunity a couple of years ago to be part of an observer team at The Hague at a climate change conference. The head of the U.S. team of the Clinton administration that was there said at the beginning of that conference: We will not propose laws that will damage the economy of the United States. And he said: No agreement is better than a bad agreement. The conference began and the pressure built.

During that time I had the opportunity to have a dialog with some of our counterparts from different Parliaments around the world. For the first time, I began to understand that they don't understand us. They didn't realize that a treaty negotiated by an administration and signed off on by an administration was not law until the Senate ratified it. Why? Well, if you are a member of a parliamentary body and you are elected and then you, if you are in the majority party, elect the Prime Minister out of that, that Prime Minister and the parliamentary body are, in essence, one. If that Prime Minister signs off on a treaty, it is law, unless the country doesn't like it. Then you hold a special election and get rid of the Prime Minister and the party. You get a new party and a new Prime Minister. That is how it works for a lot of countries in the world.

It does not work that way here. Our Founding Fathers created a division of labor in our Constitution. I think it was quite a clear division. When I began to say: The Kyoto treaty is not law in our country, it is a proposed treaty the Senate of the United States has refused to consider, therefore, it is not law, therefore, our negotiators don't have to negotiate to it or for it, the European parliamentarians, didn't understand that, or at least they chose not to understand it.

Of course, I was there as part of an observer team. I spent a lot of time encouraging the team not to make bad law, not to craft an agreement with which we couldn't live. Ultimately, they could not agree with the parliamentarians of Europe, and they came home.

That is the reality of where we are at the moment. That is why it is important to understand the frustrations our trade ambassador has when he goes to the table and they say: Why can't you just negotiate something? That has been arguable, why we have wanted TPA or fast track over the years. It is why we originally gave it.

But from the 1960s to 2002, the world and the economies of the world and the economies of this country and the economies of Idaho and the economies of Minnesota have changed dramatically in part because of trade, both positive and negative.

I believe it is right and proper that we debate this issue today, that we don't sweep it under the rug, that we ask our colleagues to choose whether we ought to have a point of order and whether we ought to have a simple majority vote on the need to change the trade remedy laws of our country as proposed by the trade agreement that is on the floor at the time or if we should retain the existing law.

In the letter sent this morning by the administration, they say that "first and foremost, the amendment derails TPA without justification." I disagree with that. The Senator from Minnesota said it so well: An appointed bureaucrat is not an elected Senator. The oath of office we take to adhere to the Constitution is so clear and so simple and so important. We ought to be extremely cautious about delegating that constitutional responsibility to an unelected official.

The trade ambassador would say: You don't do that. You ultimately get to vote on it. I think I have talked about the vote, the circumstances of the vote, the climate in which the vote is cast. That is why we are here today suggesting we make some subtle changes in the law.

"We have been committed not just to preserving U.S. trade laws but, more importantly, to using them." This is the administration talking in the letter. You are right; they have. And yet we are saying: we want to preserve them if it fits for you to use. They are saying, no, no; they can be negotiable or at least we want the right to negotiate.

We are not denying that right. I have said it once. The Senator from Minnesota has said it. We are not denying the right of negotiation at all. If we are bright and clear and articulate in what we do, we will not sour the debate or the environment in which those negotiations occur because if I were a negotiator, I would say: You bet, we will talk about it. We will put it on the table. It will require a simple majority to pass. But then the whole agreement will.

In all fairness to the administration, they recognize in the letter 41 Senators are a minority blocking this process. We offered to the administration yesterday that we would make some modification. They did not see fit to accept that. We went ahead. The Senator from Minnesota, when he offered the amendment this morning, modified it so it is not a two-thirds. It is a simple majority on the point of order, exactly the same vote it takes to pass the whole package. I believe that is a reasonable and right approach and a fair approach toward dealing with this issue.

A minority ought not be allowed to block trade law or any law for that matter. We rule by a majority procedurally. We deal with supermajorities on occasion, and we have done it here on occasion, and with cloture and other issues to protect trade laws.

Mr. DAYTON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CRAIG. I am happy to respond.

Mr. DAYTON. The Senator will recall—I would like the RECORD to show I ask the Senator, I received a call from a colleague on a matter this morning and indicated a desire to change, modify this amendment and make it more acceptable to the administration. I would like to ask if that was the Senator's intent, to make this one that would be more acceptable to the administration?

Let me say also parenthetically that, as a member of the other political party, I do not intend this amendment in any respect to be something that is referenced to this particular administration. I respect the role the administration has taken, that the trade ambassador has taken with regard to the steel products, as the Senator indicated. I thought it was a very strong position the President took with regard to the lumber coming from Canada; that, as the Senator said, this administration is far more aggressive than its predecessor in that regard, and also with regard to Canadian wheat. My concern in offering this was not with regard to any particular administration. My interest was in protecting this Congress for many administrations to come on this matter.

I ask the Senator, is this attempt on our part one that came out of the Senator's negotiations and discussions with the administration?

Mr. CRAIG. It is that. I thought that was a right and reasonable approach. We should not ask for a supermajority on issues that can be passed or should be passed by a majority of the body.

The Senator from Minnesota listened to those arguments, accepted those arguments today. I was pleased that his amendment could be modified for that purpose.

In the administration's letter there is another argument. They say:

> Secondly, the amendment would jeopardize our current trade negotiations, especially the new global trade liberalization mandate launched in Doha last November.

My reaction to that is, it does not.

They go on to say:

> This is not a hypothetical observation. The failure to launch a global trade negotiation at Seattle in 1999 was due in significant part to a refusal even to discuss trade laws.

Well, that was then. This is now. I have just said—the Senator from Minnesota has just said—discuss trade laws. Put them on the table. Look at the fact that they might need adjustment or change, that laws we have written in the 1960s might need some change.

All we are saying is, when the package comes back, it will require, if a point of order is brought against a change that you have already reported to us, Mr. Ambassador, a 50-percent plus one of those present and voting.

The conversation in Doha or the next round ought to go like this: While the Congress of the United States is giving us new expanded trade authority and negotiation authority, it also recognized the strong desire on the part of the citizens of our country to protect some process of trade remedy and trade remedy laws that are currently on the books of the United States. So any changes that we would make in them or propose to be made—and we are certainly willing to discuss those and talk about them, as we also want to talk about you, Spain, or you, France, or you, Germany, or somewhere else's trade laws—will be subject to the same vote as required for passage of the trade package.

Instead of going with alarm, the ambassador ought to go with a very clear, matter-of-fact statement, and then roll up his sleeves and get at the business of negotiating in a way that I hope will help American agriculture and a lot of our industries.

Trade remedy laws are not off limits. Those are the words used in the administration's letter today: Not off limits at all; available for full discussion, full debate, negotiation and change subject to a majority vote of the Senate. I think that is right, that is proper, and that is what we ought to be about.

Their fourth argument was the WTO negotiations launched in Doha will not impair our ability to enforce U.S. trade laws. I think our explanation stands. If the ambassador brings back a package and in it there is substantive law change proposed and the dynamics of the package are such that the world and the economy of this country is saying pass it, pass it, pass it, there will be no opportunity because the law would not require, unless this amendment is adopted, us to make those adjustments if collectively the Congress of the United States felt the negotiators had gone beyond what we believe to be right and proper protection under those laws.

(Mrs. CARNAHAN assumed the chair.)

Mr. DORGAN. Will the Senator from Idaho yield for a question?

Mr. CRAIG. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. DORGAN. Madam President, I would like to propound a question to my colleague. I believe this is one of the most important amendments we will be dealing with on the trade promotion authority legislation. I am pleased to be a cosponsor, and I will be pleased to speak in support of it at some point.

I ask the Senator from Idaho, is it the case that much of the angst that exists with respect to recent trade agreements—U.S.-Canada, NAFTA, and others—is that when we see areas of clear trade problems, clear manipulation of the markets, clear abuse of trading practices, we cannot ever get much of a remedy?

We have all these trade agreements, but we cannot get a remedy; we cannot get a problem solved. Why? At least one of the reasons, in my judgment—and I inquire of the Senator from Idaho if he feels the same way—is that we have weakened all these remedies to the point that no one wants to use them because they believe they are ineffective.

For example, section 22 is pretty much gone. In many ways, section 301 is made much weaker by subsequent negotiations. The result is, it does not matter whether it is wheat from Canada or high-fructose corn syrup from Mexico or a dozen items I could mention. We just cannot get anybody to tackle a remedy to say: Yes, this is unfair, and we will stand up on behalf of our producers and deal with it. That is why this amendment makes so much sense.

If the Trade Representative negotiates a new trade agreement and that agreement further weakens remedies that now exist, my understanding is the amendment allows that to come back to the Congress for an up-or-down vote. I think that is one of the most important provisions that we could adopt to this underlying bill.

I ask the Senator from Idaho, is it the case that the biggest problem these days has been we cannot get a remedy for anything in international trade?

Mr. CRAIG. The Senator from North Dakota has explained it very well, and that is the essence of this amendment. Again, a simple majority vote of this body will do so. Let me complete my comments. I have spoken long enough. There are others who wish to speak on this issue.

I close by speaking to the second-degree amendment the Senator from Iowa has just proposed, and I hope at some time we appropriately will move to table that second-degree amendment. Let me tell my colleagues why.

There is nothing in that amendment with which I disagree as part of process and procedure. You bet we should have talked about proposed substitutes and changes removed from, I call it the catchall title to the advanced title, to a higher priority as it relates to the direction we give our negotiators and ambassadors, the principles of negotiation and the objective of those principles.

The second-degree amendment, though, takes away the point of order. It says, here is how you negotiate, but it does not deny the right of the Senate to speak. I hope at the appropriate time, early afternoon, we will offer a motion to table that amendment. I do believe we need a good straight up-or-down vote on the Dayton-Craig amendment. It is an important amendment.

I yield the floor. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Madam President, at this time I am not going to address either my amendment or the amendment by the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Idaho. I do wish to speak generically about the issue before us, to which the amendment of the Senators from Minnesota and Idaho are very central, and to remind my colleagues what trade promotion authority is all about.

First, as all my colleagues know, nothing can be done under the Constitution about trade unless the Congress of the United States does it, because one of our explicit powers in the Constitution is to regulate interstate and foreign commerce. It is our authority, and Congress rightfully and according to our oath of office ought to protect our constitutional responsibilities, and we ought to perform our constitutional responsibilities.

For the first 150-year history of our country, when all Congress had to do in regard to trade was put on tariffs, up or down, and other business of that nature, it was very appropriate for Congress to initiate and finalize action as far as the regulation of interstate and foreign commerce was concerned.

Since the 1930s, we have been involved in cooperative efforts with other countries to reduce tariff and nontariff trade barriers because it was seen then and today as mutually beneficial to all nations to do so. We have been involved in international agreements and international fora to accomplish those goals.

One can imagine how impossible it would be then in an international forum to have 535 Members of Congress, in a meeting of 142 countries, negotiating trade agreements, with the Congress of the United States speaking for the United States. It is almost impossible for Congress to reach an agreement among its Members without, in the process, trying to negotiate with 142 other countries. So for the last 25 years, or some people would say in different ways since 1935, we have given the President permission to negotiate agreements with other countries.

In a sense, the United States, through this legislation and previous legislation, has set up a contract with the President of the United States saying we would like to have him negotiate for the Congress of the United States, where the constitutional power lies, some agreements under strict authority that we would give the President, and with Congress having final authority to adopt what was negotiated if we agreed to it.

We are talking about giving the President the power to negotiate for us because it is an impossibility for the Congress to enter such a forum.

The basic question to our colleagues as they consider Dayton-Craig and other amendments is: Do they want the President of the United States to have this authority? This is not blanket authority given to the President of the United States. It is very confined to subject matter. It is very confined to the President reporting to the Congress of the United States on a regular basis what has been done and to get our feedback so that the President carries out the intent of Congress in the negotiations.

Finally, the President of the United States has to come to an agreement with 142 countries. Remember, that is not done by a majority vote of those 142 countries. That is done by consensus. So if the President of the United States feels the interests of the United States are not adequately protected, all the President has to do is walk away, and there is no new WTO agreement.

Eventually, if the President decides U.S. interests are being protected and he agrees to it and the other 142 countries agree to it, then it comes to us to make a decision whether or not the interests of the United States are adequately protected as the President negotiated with us, and it takes a majority vote in the House and Senate for that to become law of the land.

The basic question before the Senate in the Dayton-Craig amendment is whether or not they want the President of the United States to be credible at the bargaining table. The issue is whether or not the President will be credible if, when he reaches an agreement, there is opportunity in the Senate to have separate votes on separate parts of the agreement so some can be dropped and others might be adopted.

Do my colleagues think the other 142 countries of the WTO are going to negotiate with our country on that basis?

Do you think there will be a final agreement? No. The Dayton-Craig amendment undoes the pattern of this contract between the President of the United States and the Congress over the last 25 years.

So we all have to ask ourselves: Has the United States prospered by our international agreements over the last quarter of a century by the process that is once again before us to set up a contract with the President of the United States to negotiate? I have come to the conclusion this process has been good, but I am a Republican. Maybe Democrats would question my judgment of whether or not this is a good process.

So I have said before in this debate, and I want to say again, listen to what President Clinton said as he correctly bragged about the agreements he finalized—that started in previous administrations—during his first year in office. The North American Free Trade Agreement and the Uruguay Round of the General Agreement of Tariffs and Trades were finalized during his first months in office.

He says as a result of those agreements, and I suppose he would say, too, predecessors to those agreements, that the United States has benefited very well by it. And he used, as I heard him say so many times, that there were, I think the figure was, 22 million jobs created during his administration, and one-third of those jobs were related to trade.

If President Clinton says that, if President Bush believes this is a good process to continue, and you have one Democratic President and one Republican President who think proceeding down the road that we have gone for the last 25 years is the right road to go, I think it would carry some weight with people on both sides of the aisle and it would be a no-brainer that this process ought to be continued. Our colleagues are suggesting that would put a kink in this machine, and that might not be the thing to do. I raise those questions with my colleagues.

I also raise the questions with my colleagues of whether or not the present trade remedies are working, which I heard a few minutes ago. Well, what do they think the steel agreement is all about? The President is looking out for our basic industry, to give it some help through transition. The President looked at that and decided that other countries dumping steel in the United States was not right, and our economy was being hurt by it. He stepped in, in a very strong way, to protect our interests.

I think of the 201 process where the previous President stepped in, in the case of lamb coming into the United States from New Zealand and Australia. I suppose there are a lot of others I ought to refer to, but our Presidents, Republican and Democrat, have been willing to use the tools that are on the table. Other nations are beginning to learn from the United States and are willing to take action to protect their industries in a way that is going to eventually hurt us.

We have been the pioneers of trade remedy legislation for a long period of time, and other nations have somewhat resented our using it, and they are beginning to learn from us and use it. Now they are doing it in a way that is not as transparent as the United States. They do it probably in a way that is less concerned about their using it on the world economy than what our Presidents have done in regard to our action and the world economy.

Now, are we going to say we should not be looking out for our interests on trade remedy legislation? I think what they are saying is we ought to let the rest of the world adopt these measures, even if they hurt the United States. Some examples: South Africa imposing dumping duties on United States poultry, closing an important $14 million market; Mexico imposing dumping duties on United States high-fructose corn syrup, decreasing our exports by half, $30 million; Mexico imposing dumping duties on certain United States swine, formerly a $450 million market; Mexico imposing dumping duties on certain cuts of beef affecting companies' abilities to service and grow this $512 million market. Just this year, Canada imposed dumping duties on United States tomatoes, $115 million. In 1999, Canada imposed dumping duties on exports of United States corn, a $36 million market resulting in little United States corn exported to Canada for 4 months until a provisional duty was removed.

These are examples of the rest of the world learning from the United States. Consequently, don't we in the United States think it would be better if our country or our President were at the table negotiating to see that these things did not happen? I think those are the issues before us.

I probably have implied very much that Dayton-Craig is a bad approach. My point is to simply say I hope my 99 other colleagues will look at the practice of the last 25 years, which has been a credible approach for the United States to be at the negotiating table, and say: Do you really want to change that? Do you want to change the credibility of the President of the United States at the negotiating table?

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. DORGAN. Madam President, of course the Senator from Iowa is correct; the Constitution does provide in article I, section 8, that the Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations—not the President, not the trade ambassador, but the Congress. That is in the Constitution of this country.

The Congress has, over some period of time, decided it would like to put handcuffs on itself so these handcuffs would prevent it from being involved in any trade negotiation or trade agreement that came back to the Congress. If it did not like a provision, if it thought a provision was not in accordance with this country's interests, the Congress will have said, by fast track or trade promotion authority, no, we are not allowed to offer amendments to that trade agreement. Congress has done that on previous occasions. I do not support that. I do not believe it is appropriate.

What the Senators from Minnesota and Idaho are saying with respect to fast track, or trade promotion authority, which will tie the Congress's hands, at least in regard to the issue of providing trade remedies for trade abuses that exist, that our businesses and our employees in this country have to try to deal with, at least with respect to those trade remedies, Congress ought to have a say in that if someone negotiates a trade agreement that weakens those trade remedies.

We have had plenty of examples: Section 22 was largely negotiated away; section 301 has been diminished in importance. So we have had examples where the trade remedies are not available.

My colleague from Iowa cited some of the trade abuses that I could cite. On high-fructose corn syrup to Mexico he says: Yes, that is a problem. Do not blame us. Let us not blame America for trade abuses that are imposed by other countries.

Unfair wheat subsidies or unfair wheat trade flooding into this country from Canada, that is a problem. That is not our fault; that is Canada's fault.

The high-fructose corn syrup, that is Mexico's fault.

I could go on to give a dozen such examples, but let's not blame our country for trade abuses that are committed by other countries. Let's make sure businesses in our country and their workers know that when another country does that, when it tries to rig the marketplace with a trade practice that is abusive, then we have a remedy against it.

Ralph Waldo Emerson said that common sense is genius dressed in work clothes. When we deal with trade issues, I find very little genius these days, especially in Washington, DC. Almost all of the debate that ought to be thoughtful turns thoughtless in an instant. This morning's Washington Post editorial is an example of that, suggesting this amendment is going to torpedo this trade promotion authority legislation. It will do nothing of the sort. It strengthens it.

Let me give some examples of what is going on in trade. Canada pushes an avalanche of grain into our country, unfairly subsidized, unfairly traded in our country by a Canadian wheat board that is a sanctioned monopoly in Canada which would be illegal in this country. So our farmers are confronted with this massive amount of unfair trade, and it takes money right out of the pockets of our family farmers, and nothing can be done about it. It has been going on for 10 years. It was given the green light, incidentally, in the United States-Canada Free Trade Agreement, which I voted against; nonetheless, this has been going on relentlessly, and nobody does anything about it.

We had an investigation by the ITC, and they said: Yes, Canada is guilty of unfair trade. There was a 301 action filed by wheat growers in my State, and the trade ambassador said: No, despite the fact that there is a conclusion that Canada is guilty of unfair trade, we will not impose fair trade quotas that United States law would allow because it might be inconsistent with NAFTA and the WTO. But Ambassador Zoellick says to farmers: Don't lose hope. Under U.S. laws you can always consider filing antidumping or countervailing duty cases.

Let me show my colleagues a Congress Daily Report, November 26, 2001—November 9 through 14: The WTO ministerial at Doha, Qatar, Trade Representative Zoellick agreed that U.S. antidumping laws could be discussed as the new round gets underway.

In other words, in the next round the antidumping laws will be up for discussion because many countries don't want us to have antidumping laws. They want to dump their products into the American marketplace, and if our producers are concerned about that—saying we cannot compete, we will have to close our plant, we can't compete against products coming from China or Japan or Europe or Canada or Mexico or Korea, we can't possibly compete against them because they are dumping at below the cost of acquisition, what are we going to do—we are going to put this on the table to talk about. Maybe we can get rid of countervailing duty or antidumping laws. Maybe the next negotiation in a room, behind a closed door, in which we are not present, the American people are not present, trade negotiators from all around the world will decide that the United States will agree to get rid of its antidumping laws. Maybe that is what will happen.

If that happens, I sure want the Congress to be able to vote on that separately on behalf of farmers, factory workers, steelworkers. I want Congress to have a shot at saying yes or no, and my vote is going to be a resounding no.

One final point, if I might. I have just had a bellyful of people saying it is wrong to worry about protecting America's interests. The word "protect" has become a vulgarism in trade speech, and I find that Byzantine.

Who in this Chamber does not want to stand up and protect our country's interests? Who do you not want to protect? Do you not want to protect a steel industry that is under siege from unfairly subsidized shipments into this country? Do you not want to protect farmers and factory workers? Who is it you do not want to protect? Isn't it our job to decide that we will protect our industries to the extent of demanding fair trade?

I don't mean, by "protection," saying we are going to put walls around our country. I don't mean that at all. I don't believe we should do that. I believe we ought to be required and able to compete at any time, at any place in the world. That competition does not mean, however, that our companies and our workers ought to compete with 12-year-olds who work 12 hours a day and are paid 12 cents an hour in some plant 8,000 miles away, and some company takes the product of that plant and moves it to a store shelf in Pittsburgh or Fargo or Los Angeles or Pocatello. It is not fair trade and it is not what our businesses and workers ought to have to put up with.

When we talk about protecting our country's economic interests, it is not about diminishing trade or putting walls around our country. It is about saying we have a right in this country to protect the economic interests of businesses and workers who want to play by the rules when they confront others in this world who decide they will not play by the rules.

One final point. I have made this point over and over because it is so dramatic. I want to mention automobile trade with Korea to demonstrate what is happening on a range of things throughout the world in a way that hurts our workers and hurts our companies. Last year, Korea sent us 630,000 cars, Daewoos, Hyundais, and others. Madam President, 630,000 Korean cars came into the U.S. marketplace. Good for them.

Last year, we were only able to sell 2,800 cars in Korea. Let me say that again: 630,000 Korean cars coming to the United States, and we were only able to get 2,800 U.S. cars sold in Korea. Do you know why? Because the Korean Government doesn't want American cars sold in Korea. It is very simple. And that is not fair. We ought to say to Korea and other countries, if your market is open to American products, then our market is open to you. But if we make the American marketplace open to your products, then you had better open your marketplace or you find a way to sell your cars in Kishasa, Zaire, next year and see how you like that marketplace.

I want to speak a little later, but let me say Senator DAYTON and Senator CRAIG have propounded an amendment that is very important. All it says is we need to preserve the opportunity to vote if someone behind a closed door in some room half a world away is going to negotiate away the remedies for unfair trade, our remedies to get after and take after the unfair trade that exists.

That is not antitrade; that is protrade. That is not undercutting the bill that is on the floor of the Senate; that in fact will strengthen and improve it.

I yield the floor.

Mr. REID. Madam President, the Senator from South Carolina has asked to speak.

Under the previous order, we are to go out in 1 minute. I ask unanimous consent the Senator from South Carolina, Mr. HOLLINGS, be recognized for up to 15 minutes, and this will be for debate only. At that time, we would go out for the party caucuses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Madam President, I thank the distinguished leader and the two distinguished sponsors of this particular amendment, the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Idaho. There is nothing better than a clear-cut, clean-cut little amendment, this particular provision. It simply says: Wait a minute, we don't want just an up-or-down vote on an overall patchwork of all kinds of trade measures, and all kinds of articles, and everything else of that kind.

Somebody might not like what they got on prunes. Somebody might not like what they have on textiles and everything else.

We are not disturbing whatever the negotiations are of our special Trade Representative, or the President. They tried to label it as either you are for the President or against the President. That is baloney.

What it says is: Wait a minute, before you have to vote up or down to just bring a whole trade bill down, let's make certain the basic laws are right. Here is how it reads:

> Notwithstanding any other provision of law [it] . . . shall not apply to any provisions in an implementing bill being considered by the Senate that modifies or amends, or requires a modification of, or an amendment to, any law of the United States that provides safeguards from unfair foreign trade practices to United States businesses or workers, including—imposition of countervailing and antidumping duties . . . national security import restrictions—

It goes down and lists those things that they are trying to safeguard from unfair trade practices.

Even then, only on a point of order will the majority vote up or down. So you do not have to argue the entire trade measure that they have spent months and months, sometimes years and years on. You can just bring it to a majority vote.

If I were the President or anybody else were the President, they would say please put that in there. We are not trying to superimpose this kind of authority over the Congress. Article I, section 8, of the Constitution says that the Congress has that responsibility. It is not the responsibility of the Special Trade Representative, not the Supreme Court, not the President—we have the responsibility. What I am trying to do is protect that responsibility. The administration should want me protecting the Constitution.

What really is happening is that people do not understand the fix. Let me explain what I call the fix.

If you go back to the early '90s to the enactment of NAFTA, the North American Free Trade Agreement, the trade treaty with Mexico, it was a very interesting thing.

The New York Times published an article, after the vote was cast, about the 26 freebies that President Clinton did, to put on the fix in order to pass that particular measure. He gave two golf rounds, one in California, and another one somewhere in Arkansas for votes; he gave two C–17s to another Congressman; he gave a cultural center to Congressman Pickle, down in Texas, for a vote.

At least those freebies, in order to fix the vote, got some people some jobs. Look the golf matches at least got somebody a job to cut the grass.

Let's clear the air and understand what is going on right now. Under Mr. Bush's plan, we would not be allowed to debate and consider these trade measures—except in a limited way. The Senators from Minnesota and Idaho, said: Heavens above, let us have at least the national security laws, countervailing duties, and antidumping laws—where a point of order will give you an up-or-down vote and you do not have to vote up or down the entire trade measure.

There is a very interesting article here—the unmitigated gall of the proponents of fast track.

Let me read it:

> The Bush Administration indicated that the President might veto trade legislation if the Senate adds a provision that would allow Congress to amend foreign trade agreements the President negotiates. This week, the Senate is considering granting Bush fast track trade powers. Under fast track, Congress could approve or reject trade pacts but could not amend them. However, Senators Mark Dayton, Democrat of Minnesota, and Larry Craig, Republican of Idaho, are pushing an amendment that would allow Congress to change trade pacts. They say Congress must have the power to make changes to protect U.S. workers. Commerce Department officials said that would defeat the purpose of fast track and they would recommend that Bush veto the legislation.

In short, yes, the President does not have the authority under the Constitution. The Congress, under article I, section 8, has the authority and the responsibility. The President, and his little minion, Robert Zoellick, the Trade Representative—he runs around and smiles and grins in all of these places, and he can amend anything. He can amend the laws. But, oh, they bring and amend the laws with respect to our national security, with respect to countervailing duties and antidumping provisions. He can amend it. But the Congress can't even consider it on an up-or-down vote.

Can you imagine the polls in such a situation as this. That Grassley amendment ought to be tabled immediately and we should not wait for 2:15. There isn't any question in my mind that this thing has gotten totally out of hand. The trade laws are not successes. The distinguished Senator from Iowa points out that everything has been coming up roses. But the fact is, we have been going out of business. Because of NAFTA we lost 53,900 textile jobs alone in the little State of South Carolina, 700,000 around the country—not just 20,000 steelworkers. So we lost all of those jobs. And we are going out of business. And the Congress of the United States tells them: Retrain, reeducate, high-tech, global competition. The President says you don't understand it.

We understand it. We retrain. I told the story—I will repeat it right quickly—of the Oneida mill in Andrews that made the little T-shirts. At the time of the closing, they had 487 workers there. The average age was 47. The next morning they did it the President's way. They retrained the employees. They are re-skilled. They are now 487 skilled computer operators.

Are you going to hire a 47-year-old computer operator or a 21-year-old computer operator? You are not taking on the retirement costs, you are not taking on the health costs of the 47-year-old. So it is a real problem.

Here we have the responsibility, and this crowd will not even let us do our job. The arrogance of this K Street crowd who writes these trade measures is unbelievable. And the President of the United States went over on the House side, and by one vote he promised—what?—he would do a fundraiser. So he has been down to Greenville to show up at a fundraiser.

It is money that talks, that controls here. You do not argue the trade measure, whether it is in the best interests of our country or not. This thing has gotten totally out of hand. And to come here and say whether this President likes it or that President likes it, well, this Senator does not like it at all.

We have many other measures, too. I noticed that Nick Calio, and his minion at the White House, said we have to get on, we can get rid of this bill this week and we can get it to conference, and everything else like that. We have barely been able to get on this particular amendment to discuss it. And then they say, well, we will put in a little maneuver here. And we will fix that vote. And we will not even have it, even when they have changed it from a 60-vote point of order down to just a majority vote up or down. They will not even let you have a majority up-or-down vote on the security of the United States under the responsibilities of the Senate.

They say that past Presidents like it. Past Presidents don't go back down to Arkansas—they move to New York. They don't sell this trade bill as being good for farmers in Arkansas, I can tell you that. They won't run for election down there. And they won't do it in my State of South Carolina, either.

It is a hearty development to find the distinguished Senator from Idaho, and the Senator from North Dakota—they know that agricultural business extremely well. They are now joining in because they are losing all the agriculture. The 3½ million farmers that we have in America cannot outproduce 700 million farmers in China. That is why we have a deficit in the balance of trade with respect to corn.

They tell me that now China is shipping to Japan and Korea some of their wheat so they can continue to appear as if they are taking our wheat. But we are going out of business there. And we will not have the wonderful export of America's most productive production; namely, America's agriculture.

So I hope we will slow down, stop, look, and listen, and understand that all we are trying to do is our job. And our job is to regulate foreign commerce. Please let us have a vote up or down. Do not come in and say, you cannot even have an up-or-down vote on the antidumping substantive law, that you can repeal it. Because once they repeal it in Doha, or any other foreign land, we're in trouble. When the trade reps meet to discuss agreements they don't go to places like Seattle any more, where people can go to and demonstrate and tell about our trade experiences here in the United States. No, they pick a place that no one ever heard of. You can't find it on the map.

The next meeting will be down in the Antarctic. I have been down there. It is hard to get there. That is where they will have the next trade negotiation, where nobody can be heard. And they will get the fix, and then they will come back and do exactly what is happening on this bill.

There is a fix. In this particular case it is not golf games and not C-17s, it is not cultural centers like it was on NAFTA, but it is welfare. It does not employ anybody. It says: Well, we give you a little welfare to keep your mouth shut, so you can go back home and run for reelection. It is not about trade, not about jobs.

We have the job of creating jobs. They are exporting them faster than we can possibly manage it. And now they are not only exporting their manufacturing, they are exporting the executive office to Bermuda.

So here, in a time of war, when you should hear the word "sacrifice," they put the President on TV, who says: Don't worry. Take a trip. Go to Disney World. Take your family. And what we ought to do is cut some more taxes to run the debt up.

You are going to hear about that because by this time next month we will be in desperate circumstances. We have to increase the debt limit, but they will not say they will increase the debt limit. They will try to say it is the war, as to why we need to borrow money. Oh, no, it is not the war. It is the trillions of dollars they have lost. And now they want to lose another $4 trillion.

Larry Lindsey—he doesn't like me referring to him—but he is the one who opposed what we had going with President Clinton and Secretary Summers to stop all of these offshore locations from avoiding taxes. They even had a bill, reported out of the committee over on the House side, that did that.

You would think, by gosh, we would be raising taxes to pay for the war, certainly not escaping our civic duty in a time of war. But that is the hands that we are dealt. The wonderful Business Roundtable, the Conference Board, the National Association of Manufacturers, and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce—oh, they will all tell you what is good for the country. What they are saying is wrecking the economy. They don't want to pay for anything. All they want to do is just help everybody buy the different elections.

I see my time is up. I hope that at 2:15, when they move to table, Madam President, that the people will sober up and come to the floor and give us a chance on that vote to table the Grassley amendment so we can do our job. We don't say one way or the other; we just say, give us an up-or-down vote to consider the security, consider the antidumping provisions, as the Dayton-Craig amendment calls for.

Madam President, I yield the floor.

RECESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 12:30 having arrived, the Senate will now stand in recess until the hour of 2:15 p.m.

Thereupon, the Senate, at 12:46 p.m., recessed until 2:16 p.m. and reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. BREAUX).

ANDEAN TRADE PREFERENCE EXPANSION ACT—Continued

AMENDMENT NO. 3408

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, as soon as we have someone here from the other side, I will move to table the amendment now pending. We have had a good debate. The debate was very constructive all morning. It is time to test the strength of the second-degree amendment and find out what we are going to do.

As we proceed through this trade legislation, we should have more debates such as we had this morning. We should vote as soon as we have had debate. Of course, a motion to table can be offered at any time. It is high time we did this on this amendment.

I was talking to some Democratic Senators this morning. Between the two Senators they have six or seven amendments. So there is a lot that needs to be done on this legislation. If someone does not have an opportunity to speak on one amendment, they can certainly do it on the other.

I hope we can continue to move this legislation. I know Senator DAYTON and Senator CRAIG have waited for days on offering their amendment.

I say to my friend from Minnesota, I appreciate very much his patience in waiting to get to a point to test the strength of what is happening.

I have been told that the Dayton-Craig amendment has at least 60 votes in favor of it. I certainly think we should find out if that is the case. There have been some who have been trying to prevent Senators DAYTON and CRAIG from having a vote on their amendment. I suggest that is not the way we should do things. Something this complex and this important we should move as quickly as possible.

I therefore move to table the amendment and ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Ms. STABENOW). Is there a sufficient second?

There is not a sufficient second.

Mr. GRAMM. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The senior assistant bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REID. I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. REID. Madam President, I renew my request to table the amendment.

I withhold that request.

Madam President, I ask for the attention of my friend from Iowa. Is it the Senator's intention to withdraw the amendment?

Mr. GRASSLEY. Yes.

AMENDMENT NO. 3409 WITHDRAWN

Mr. GRASSLEY. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 3408

Mr. REID. Madam President, I move to table the Dayton amendment, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The question is on agreeing to the motion to table amendment No. 3408. The clerk will call the roll.

The senior assistant bill clerk called the roll.

Mr. NICKLES. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) is necessarily absent.

I further announce that if present and voting the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) would vote "no."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 61, as follows:

NOT VOTING—1

Helms

The motion was rejected.

Mr. REID. Madam President, I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. CRAIG. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. REID. Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAUCUS. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAUCUS. Madam President, I rise today to discuss U.S. trade remedy laws—antidumping, anti-subsidy, and safeguard laws.

Senators DAYTON and CRAIG have offered an amendment on this important issue. I want to say a few words about our trade laws. While much of this year's debate over fast track has centered around labor and environment, there has been less talk about the equally important issue of U.S. trade laws—specifically, how we will ensure that these laws are not weakened in future trade negotiations. This is not an academic issue. In Doha last November, our trade negotiators put U.S. trade laws on the negotiating table. I believe that was a mistake. And I want to make it clear now: This Senate and this Congress will not tolerate weakening changes to our trade laws.

It is a grave mistake to suggest that the United States must weaken its trade laws to be a participant in future trade negotiations. There is virtually no political support for such a position. The last tabling motion showed that. There were 61 Senators who voted not to table the underlying amendment. This point was made clear in the letter sent to the President last year by nearly two-thirds of the Senate.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of this letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAY 7, 2001.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We are writing to state our strong opposition to any international trade agreement that would weaken U.S. trade laws.

Key U.S. trade laws, including antidumping law, countervailing duty law, Section 201, and Section 301, are a critical element of U.S. trade policy. A wide range of agricultural and industrial sectors has successfully employed these statutes to address trade problems. Unfortunately, experience suggests that many other industries are likely to have occasion to rely upon them in future years.

Each of these laws is fully consistent with U.S. obligations under the World Trade Organization (WTO) and other trade agreements. Moreover, these laws actually promote free trade by countering practices that both distort trade and are condemned by international trading rules.

U.S. trade laws provide American workers and industries the guarantee that, if the United States pursues trade liberalization, it will also protect them against unfair foreign trade practices and allow time for them to address serious import surges. They are part of a political bargain struck with Congress and the American people under which the United States has pursued market opening trade agreements in the past.

Congress has made clear its position on this matter. In draft fast track legislation considered in 1997, both Houses of Congress have included strong provisions directing trade negotiators not to weaken U.S. trade laws. Congress has restated this position in resolutions, letters, and through other means.

Unfortunately, some of our trading partners, many of whom maintain serious unfair trade practices, continue to seek to weaken these laws. This may simply be posturing by those who oppose further market opening, but—whatever the motive—the United States should no longer use its trade laws as bargaining chips in trade negotiations nor agree to any provision that weaken or undermine U.S. trade laws.

We look forward to your response.

Sincerely,

Baucus, DeWine, Specter, Rockefeller, Kerry, Byrd, Hollings, Conrad, Voinovich, Snowe, Bingaman, Collins, Santorum, Graham, Thomas, Durbin, Torricelli, Enzi, Murray, Dorgan, Akaka, Inouye, Landrieu, Boxer, Breaux, Craig, Helms, Edwards, Sarbanes, Lincoln, Johnson, Dayton, Mikulski, Lott, Daschle, Bayh, Dodd, Wellstone, McConnell, Sessions, Kennedy, Clinton, Thurmond, Schumer, Bunning, Carnahan, Cleland, Wyden, Levin, Crapo, Feinstein, Cantwell, Burns, Stabenow, Carper, Miller, Smith of New Hampshire, Smith of Oregon, Reid, Harkin, Shelby, Lieberman.

Mr. BAUCUS. Our trading partners should also understand this point. There are many countries that want to weaken U.S. trade laws. Why? Because they want to be able, if you will, to dump subsidized products—ship products that violate the basic principles of WTO—within the United States.

It is very difficult for us to protect ourselves if we don't have our antidumping and countervailing duty and section 201 trade laws.

I must say almost every country in the world, and certainly many in South America, are eager to negotiate free trade agreements with the United States. There are many South American countries that want to do so. Unfortunately, a thorn in our side and a thorn in the side of the countries in our joint effort to try to reach agreement on FTAA, for example, I say very respectfully, is the country of Brazil.

I think it is important to step back and ask why countries such as Brazil want us to weaken our trade laws. The answer, of course is pretty simple: their companies and their workers will benefit—at the expense of ours.

In the last couple of years, there has been considerable debate regarding the use of trade laws in the context of the steel import crisis. Last year, the administration and the Senate Finance Committee worked together to initiate a "section 201" investigation, which allows relief where an industry has been seriously injured by imports. The case of steel is well known—international overcapacity and unfair trade practices have been the norm for decades. But unfair trade practices are not limited to the steel industry. Foreign governments have sought to undercut other strategic U.S. industries—including semiconductors, consumer electronics, and supercomputers.

That last point is important—so I want to emphasize it again. Foreign governments have sought to harm American companies and workers. Opponents of dumping laws often suggest that if a foreign company wants to sell us a product cheaply we, should take advantage of that. After all isn't that what, competition is all about? But that view is far too simplistic. Companies can succeed in dumping over an extended period of time only if supported by government policies—trade barriers, subsidies, lax enforcement of their own antitrust laws.

Profits gained in protected foreign markets allow foreign companies to splash prices in the United States in order to gain market share. Indeed, efficient American mills must compete with foreign mills that produce steel regardless of need. Foreign steel mills often act as little more than subsidized work programs.

I might digress slightly. The same is true with subsidized lumber in Canada. They are tantamount to subsidized work programs and subsidized timber production in the lumber industry to such a great degree.

In 1999, for example, foreign overcapacity was more than two times as great as the total annual steel consumption in the United States.

With other export markets largely closed, there is an overwhelming incentive to send underpriced steel to the open U.S. market. Let me repeat that point. Other countries tend to close their markets to companies and countries that dump steel or subsidize steel production. So what happens? That steel tends to be diverted to the United States because we, by comparison, have such an open market compared with other countries that otherwise import steel.

So without fair trade laws, investment dollars would simply not flow to American companies. For example, why would anybody invest in a U.S. company, even a highly efficient one, that could so easily be undercut by unfair foreign competition?

So it is not only a matter of workers, employees getting jobs in the United States, but it is also foreign investment and domestic investment in American companies in the United States.

A smart investor would invest in a company where its government protected its market share.

Still, the point is argued, why not just allow consumers to take advantage of cheap products? It certainly is true there may be a short-term advantage for consumers and consuming industries. But over the long term, we risk gutting our manufacturing base and gutting the technological edge of American companies.

Just think about it a second. If other countries dump, how can we invest in the United States to gain and maintain a technological edge?

For any consuming industry complaining about the use of our trade laws in the steel industry, just ask yourself what their reaction would be to foreign governments targeting their industry.

But beyond economic rationale, we risk losing the political support for trade. Trade laws are part of the political bargain. If free trade is not perceived as fair, Americans will not support it. Why would Americans support free trade if the perception is that it exposes them to foreign governments' unfair trade practices?

Consider also the consequences if we do not have effective trade laws. Trade laws ensure uniform treatment. In bad economic times, there will always be calls to take action against imports. Without consistent and transparent trade laws, those calls will come for general trade barriers against imports. The internationally negotiated trade laws we currently follow seek to provide an objective set of criteria. I might add, our trade laws are totally WTO consistent, a point some critics forget to mention.

Some have also asked whether we really need to worry about our laws being weakened in international negotiations. Recent history demonstrates why we should be concerned.

I might say, NAFTA's dispute resolution procedures under chapter 19 have significantly undermined our enforcement of U.S. trade laws. Both the GATT Tokyo Round and the Uruguay Round weakened our antidumping and safeguard rules; that is, it happens, it is not just theory. It is happening. And our laws continue to be attacked and weakened by dispute panels exceeding their authority.

Some have suggested we use negotiations as an opportunity to address due process and transparency concerns in the application of other countries' trade laws. But remember that fast track is only used to change U.S. laws. If we are only looking at the laws of foreign governments, we can resolve those differences outside of the U.S. implementing legislation.

As for difficulties encountered by U.S. exporters facing foreign countries' trade remedy actions, those are problems of compliance with the existing WTO rules, not problems requiring us to revisit the rules themselves.

Let me now turn to the Senate bill. I want to make sure my colleagues appreciate the strong provisions protecting U.S. trade laws.

First, as was the case in the House legislation, our bill provides that the President must not undercut U.S. trade laws and should also seek to put an end to the foreign practices that make trade laws necessary in the first place. Section 2102(c)(9) of the bill states, first, that the President shall:

> (A) preserve the ability of the United States to enforce rigorously its trade laws, including the antidumping, countervailing duty, and safeguard laws, and avoid agreements that lessen the effectiveness of domestic and international disciplines on unfair trade, especially dumping and subsidies, or that lessen the effectiveness of domestic and international safeguard provisions. . . .

Pretty strong stuff.

Second, the bill states the President shall—I underline the word "shall":

> (B) address and remedy market distortions that lead to dumping and subsidization including overcapacity, cartelization, and market access barriers.

In addition, the Senate bill makes important additions to the House bill.

Under this legislation, the Secretary of Commerce must form a strategy to seek improved adherence to WTO dispute settlement panels to the standards of review contained in the WTO agreements or lose fast-track procedures.

In findings, the legislation identifies particular concerns regarding recent WTO decisions affecting U.S. trade laws.

The Senate bill also requires that the chairmen and the ranking members of the Finance and Ways and Means Committees to separately determine whether any changes to U.S. trade laws are consistent with the negotiated objective of not weakening U.S. trade laws.

Another protection: The President must notify the Finance and Ways and Means Committees of any proposed changes to U.S. trade laws; and, following a report by the chairmen and ranking members, the President must separately explain how proposed changes are consistent with the negotiating objectives established in the fast-track legislation.

When it comes to protecting U.S. trade laws, I believe the Senate bill is a strong bill. But let me end by emphasizing the importance of these laws.

Why do our trade agreements basically work? They work only because there is respect for the agreements themselves, and for the enforcement of those agreements. But how long will Americans support new negotiations or existing agreements if they see foreign governments taking advantage of us?

I believe the language in this fast-track bill makes it very clear that Congress will not tolerate weakening changes to U.S. trade laws. And I—and the great majority of my colleagues—will continue to pursue this issue as we move forward in future trade negotiations.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CARPER). The Senator from Texas.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I want to talk about trade promotion authority. I want to talk a little bit about the history of how we came to be here. I want to talk about why this issue is so critically important. I want to talk about the Craig amendment. And I want to talk about how we are reaching a point where we are beginning to endanger trade promotion authority altogether.

This is a lot to talk about, and I know there are a lot of other people who want to speak, so let me begin. And let me start at a logical point: 1934.

Imagine that it is 1934 in America. One out of every three Americans is out of work. The gross domestic product of the country has declined by almost a third. We have adopted a series of protective tariffs including the onerous Smoot-Hawley tariffs initiated by Republicans and supported by Democrats. And in the process, we not only have a depression in our own country, but we, by starting a trade war worldwide, have turned the global recession of 1929 and 1930 into a global depression.

And in that humbling moment of 1934, where everything we did related to trade and the economy was wrong, there was a rare bipartisan consensus. It occurred because the country was in so much trouble, and because there was a recognition that we had created our own problem. At that moment in 1934, Republicans and Democrats got together and passed what was called the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. That Act allowed the President to negotiate 29 trade agreements between 1934 and 1945. We literally were the leader in starting up world trade again.

As world trade was reignited, as our economy started to grow, and as we fought and won World War II, the bipartisan consensus on trade grew. We saw that trade is a good thing that promotes jobs, growth, opportunity, prosperity, and freedom. The bipartisan consensus expanded to the point where in 1948 we adopted the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, known as GATT, and initiated a worldwide effort to try to open up global trade.

Subsequently, from 1947 to 1963, we completed five successful negotiating rounds under GATT. But then, in 1962, something happened that is highly relevant to the debate we are having today over the Dayton amendment. By 1962, the principal impediment to trade in the world was not protective tariffs. Instead, the key impediment was non-tariff measures anti-trade laws adopted by countries that limited the ability of trade to flow freely. For example, countries began to adopt laws allowing producers within a country to get special protection if they were harmed by trade, and allowing countries to subsidize their exports if they felt they were losing out in trade.

By 1962, therefore, President Kennedy recognized it was no longer enough to negotiate tariff reductions. We needed to negotiate away all the barriers that we and other countries had put up that consisted not of tariffs, but of non-tariff trade protections. Therefore, the Kennedy Round focused on issues such as countries' use of export subsidies, and of anti-dumping laws. When the Kennedy Round of negotiations was completed, it addressed not only tariffs, but sought to establish some worldwide rules related to countries' use of anti-trade laws.

But at that point, when presented with the Kennedy Round by the Johnson Administration, Congress approved legislation undoing the provisions of the Kennedy Round Agreement that related to anti-trade items such as export subsidies—the very provisions we are debating today in the Dayton amendment. Congress effectively amended the deal. The Kennedy Round of negotiations was agreed to by other GATT members and became the new foundation for world trade. But because Congress basically changed the deal, the United States did not participate in or get the full benefits of the Kennedy Round. We had negotiated this entire set of agreements with our trading partners. But when we changed one critical ingredient, our trading partners said: We are not willing to negotiate with the United States and then let Congress strike the parts in which the United States made concessions and yet leave the parts where we, the United States trading partners, made our concessions.

When the Kennedy Round went ahead without the United States in 1967, so shocked was Congress that in 1974 we created a new process that today is known as fast track. And every succeeding President since President Ford has had fast-track trade authority. That trade authority has allowed the President to go out and negotiate agreements with our trading partners. In those agreements we give up some things we don't want to give up, and our partners give up some things they don't want to give up, but the United States and the group of countries involved decide that overall, the trade agreement is in their interest. And that was the procedure that we had in place until 1994, when the fast-track provisions expired.

Since then, we have found that few countries in the world are willing to negotiate with us, because any trade agreement negotiated could be amended in Congress. Obviously, countries are not willing to make concessions that bind them when our concessions would not bind us should Congress decide to change them.

As a result, there are some 130 trade agreements worldwide that we in the United States are not part of. For example, Europe has negotiated an expanded trade agreement with South American nations. We have no similar agreement. Mexico has negotiated and successfully completed free trade agreements with Central and South American nations. We have no such agreements. Canada has negotiated free trade agreements with South American nations. We have been unable to have such agreements. So today, appliances that could be produced cheaper and better in the United States are being sold in Chile today by Canadian manufacturers because their manufacturers have an advantage over ours: they have a free trade agreement that means lower tariffs. Chilean consumers could buy better American appliances cheaper, but without a trade agreement, they can't buy them without having to pay a tariff. Canada benefits from that trade, and we do not.

We have come here today to try to set this situation straight. We have come here today to try to give the President the authority to promote American exports and to engage in trade liberalization around the world.

Without getting into a long harangue about it, let me say that Republicans have been asked to pay a tremendous level of tribute to get to this point. The President asked the Senate for an up-or-down vote on trade promotion authority. That request was denied. Instead, the majority has said that to get a vote on trade promotion authority, we must add a trade adjustment assistance bill to it, and that bill must contain a new provision requiring the government to pay 70 percent of the health care costs of people who lose their jobs because of trade, even though many Americans have no health care benefit when they are working.

Moreover, we have been asked to agree—and to this point we reluctantly have agreed—that if you are a worker whose company is affected by trade and is not competitive, you get not only 2 years of unemployment and 70 percent of your health care benefit, but you get part of your wages paid for by the government. Let's say you lose your job in the steel mill but you have always wanted to be a batboy for the Pittsburgh Pirates. If you take the lower-paying job as a batboy, we will supplement your wages to make up half the difference of what you lost in salary from the steel mill wages as compared to the Pittsburgh Pirates bat boy wages. Meanwhile, if you lose your job because a terrorist destroys the factory you work in, you get 6 months unemployment and you get no health care.

It is fair to say that there are 45 Republican Members of the Senate who are adamantly opposed—adamantly opposed—to those provisions. We have created two new entitlements that are unfunded and that nobody knows what they cost. We are creating the incredible anomaly where we will be taxing people who are working and who don't have health insurance in order to subsidize 70 percent of the health care costs of certain people who are unemployed but had health insurance when they worked. They now will be getting a taxpayer subsidy, even though the people paying the subsidy don't have health care themselves. And we are being asked to sign on to a system where the American Government for the first time is going to get into wage guarantees. There is no sense beating this old dead horse, but let me say that these are the same kinds of deals that Europe is desperately trying to get out of. They can't create jobs because they can't cut old jobs because they have to pay all these benefits. Yet in this tribute we are having to pay to get the trade bill, we are going in the direction that the Europeans are actively trying to get out of. We are going in the direction of imposing heavy socialistic programs that are going to have a stifling effect on the budget.

And now, in the midst of a bill that already has all these provisions that 45 Republicans hate, that will drive up the deficit, that will make the economy less competitive, and that create a terrible injustice in the system, we now are presented with an amendment before us that will literally undo fast-track authority by allowing Congress to change the deal.

Can you imagine if in buying and selling a house, or any other commonplace negotiation, you suddenly are told you must pay more than you negotiated to pay? Can you imagine how commerce would break down when deals can be renegotiated after the negotiations are done?

The whole purpose of paying this heavy tribute, and adopting all this terrible, harmful public policy is to get the positive effect of fast track whereby there is an up-or-down vote on accepting the negotiated deal. But now in comes the Dayton-Craig amendment that says to the President, OK, you can negotiate, you can give, you can take, but when the trade bill comes back, if you have negotiated in areas where Congress has written laws to hinder trade, then we get to vote on those provisions separately. And if you cannot get 51 votes, then those provisions are taken out.

What country in the world is going to be foolish enough to negotiate with us when they know there is going to be a separate vote on the parts of the agreement that we in the United States like the least? We would never negotiate with another country under circumstances where their legislative body could take out the parts of the negotiation they did not like but leave in the parts we did not like.

This amendment kills trade promotion authority because it is counter to the very thesis that underlies it. What is trade promotion authority about if it is not about an up-or-down vote on a trade agreement, without amendment? How can a provision which allows part of an agreement—the part that is likely to be least popular in the United States—to be voted on separately? How can anybody be confused that this amendment absolutely kills trade promotion authority?

As the Dayton-Craig amendment has been debated, people have gotten the idea that this amendment has to do only with unfair trade practices. But most of this amendment has nothing whatsoever to do with unfair trade practices. And even where it does, it is obvious on its face that if we could negotiate agreements to fix those practices both here and in our trading partners' countries, we would want to do it.

Let me now go through the provisions of law that would be affected by the Dayton-Craig amendment.

First, the Dayton-Craig amendment says that Congress would have the right to strike, by majority vote, any provision that would limit actions against foreign subsidies such as income or price supports. The first law the amendment talks about title VII of the Tariff Act of 1930, which includes our countervailing duty law. What is that law about? That law is about American taxpayers subsidizing American producers to compensate for the subsidies that foreign governments are giving to their manufacturers and their agricultural producers.

I ask my colleagues, when we cannot sell our agricultural products in Europe because of their subsidies, when we have spent 25 years trying to get them to reduce those subsidies, why in the world would we want to set forth a rule saying that American negotiators can negotiate anything except agricultural subsidies. Why in the world would we ever want to ban negotiations in which the Europeans agree to cut their subsidies and we agree to cut ours? Yet by taking subsidy disciplines off the table, that effectively is what we'd be doing.

What this amendment really would like to do is allow negotiations reducing European and American agricultural subsidies to go forward, but once that agreement gets over here, allow Congress to strike the provisions reducing American agricultural subsidies. Why in the world would the Europeans ever enter into such an agreement? They would never enter into such an agreement.

When 60 cents out of every dollar of farm income in America now is coming directly from the Government, when we are paying farmers literally millions of dollars to produce products that we end up having to dump on the world market, and when we claim we do this because our foreign competitors are doing the same thing, why in the world should we prevent the President from getting together the major agriculture-producing countries and saying let's stop cheating, let's get rid of these income and price support subsidy programs so we can have freer trade in agriculture?

My point is that this amendment would ban for all practical purposes all agreements that have to do with export subsidies. It would ban any agreement that has to do with eliminating the unfair trade practice of subsidies by us or by our competitors. I want my colleagues to understand that when the proponents of this amendment stand up and say they simply do not want agreements that undermine our laws protecting Americans and American producers, what they are really talking about is our ability to negotiate away harmful subsidies. Why in the world should we not be negotiating with the Europeans, the Koreans, or the Japanese to suggest that we all reduce the amount of subsidies that we are paying to dump steel on the world market? Why don't we all agree to reduce the subsidies that are resulting in overproduction of agricultural products?

The net result of this provision will not be to protect American manufacturers and farmers from losing their subsidies. The result of this amendment, if adopted, will be that there will never be another trade agreement that has anything to do with reducing export subsidies. And of all the nations on Earth, we would be the biggest beneficiary of such an agreement. What country in the world can outproduce Iowa in agriculture? We could sell billions of dollars of agricultural products in Europe if we could negotiate an end to export subsidies. Why should we prohibit the President from negotiating them? We ought to be encouraging him to negotiate them. But this amendment, despite all the rhetoric about eliminating our ability to protect our producers from unfair trade, protects us right out of being able to eliminate unfair trade.

The second provision of the Dayton-Craig amendment refers to our antidumping laws. Now, on its surface, the amendment sounds good. The President would not be able to negotiate anything that would prevent America from protecting its producers from dumping. In other words, we will not be dumped upon. But what does dumping mean?

First of all, dumping means all these low-price quality items Americans can buy for their families at department stores. But forget for a moment that American families enjoy a better quality of life from low-price imports. Why shouldn't we negotiate an agreement that says why should we subsidize products to dump on your market and why should you subsidize products to dump on our market when we could get together and negotiate an armistice where we both stop dumping?

When one listens to the rhetoric of supporters of the Dayton-Craig amendment, gosh, it sounds appealing. They say, do not eliminate our protections against dumping. But when we protect our right to dump and our right to protect ourselves against dumping, we effectively eliminate our ability to negotiate for a world where we stop dumping by everybody. That just does not make sense to me.

Third, another law covered by the Dayton-Craig amendment is Section 337, which relates to U.S. patents and copyrights. From listening to the rhetoric, you might think the amendment says that anything the President might do that weakens American patents and copyrights will require a separate vote.

But who owns all the patents and copyrights in the world? What nation in the world has tried to write language protecting patents and copyrights into every trade agreement since 1948? The United States of America. We are the only country in the world that wants to talk about copyrights and patents. Why? Because we own copyrights, and we own patents. Why in the world would we want to bar the President from holding negotiations in the very areas where the United States will benefit the most? If we, who hold the vast majority of the copyrights and patents in the world, could negotiate an international agreement on respecting copyrights and patents, would we not be the principal beneficiary of it?

Mr. DAYTON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GRAMM. I will be happy to yield, but let me finish this one point.

How can we get other countries to submit to negotiate on their patent and copyright laws if we say that we want you to change your laws but we are totally unwilling or unable to negotiate on our laws?

I will be happy to yield.

Mr. DAYTON. The Senator raises an excellent point. There are negotiations that occur that are in the best interest of the United States. Of course, we want to encourage those negotiations to proceed. Is the Senator aware there is nothing in the Dayton-Craig amendment that would require the Senate to step in on these matters? It simply permits the Senate, by a majority of the Members, to do so if, in the view of the majority of the Members, what has been negotiated is not in the best interest of the United States.

Mr. GRAMM. Let me respond. The Senator asks whether I am aware that the Senate could decide not to strip out this provision. Yes, I am aware of that point. But every country with whom we wanted to negotiate would realize that Congress nonetheless had the ability to strip provisions out. And what country would negotiate changes to its patent and copyright laws knowing that whatever change to we agreed to could be stripped out?

Let me use a contracts example. I have only a limited number of contracts examples because I am an old schoolteacher and have been a politician for a long time, and most of the examples I have are consumer examples. But what if we had negotiated a contract that I would buy your house, but we wrote into the contract that I had the ability to change one part of the contract to suit me but that you did not have a right to change a part of the contract to suit you? No party to a contract would agree to that.

I am not talking about changing copyrights and patents unilaterally. I am talking about reciprocal commitments. Congress has passed resolutions again and again demanding that trade agreements require our trading partners to change their copyright and patent laws. It has been something we have trumpeted, it is in our interest, and we should be promoting it everywhere. But how are we going to get countries to change their laws when any changes we agree to can be voted on separately? As much as I might want your house, and even if I offer a very good price, if I can come back after the contract is signed and change the price, you are not going to negotiate with me.

Mr. DAYTON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRAMM. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. DAYTON. I agree with the Senator that certainly under the terms the Senator describes, my understanding of the way this would work, if there were an agreement and the United States, by an act of this body, changed the terms of that agreement, the agreement would not be valid; the agreement would not apply.

I certainly agree with the Senator there would be no country that would want to sign and agree to something that can be changed unilaterally and still apply. My understanding is the entire agreement would have to go back to the World Trade Organization, or wherever, to be renegotiated.

Mr. GRAMM. Let me make up an example. Let's say we are negotiating with the Chinese on a trade agreement, and one of the provisions we want is for them to recognize and respect our patents and copyrights on everything from books to CDs to DVDs. If you go to China, you will see that while you cannot bring them back with you because our Customs will not let you, and for good reason, everywhere in China you can buy pirated CDs, DVDs, books, and the like. Let's say we could work out an agreement with them that required enforcement against patent infringement in return for our reducing a patent term on an AIDS medicine or on some broad spectrum antibiotic that is important to their population's general health. Even if we had to compensate the United States patent holder because of the takings provision, there might very well be a good deal in the making there. Yet, we could not make that deal if a separate vote were allowed.

My example may be somewhat unrealistic, and I am sure if Ambassador Zoellick were here he would have 100 good examples, but I think it makes the point.

Let me go to the next provision of law that would be covered by the Dayton-Craig amendment. The third area has to do with section 201. The proponents of this amendment say over and over that we cannot negotiate away our protections against unfair trade. Yet Section 201 has nothing to do with unfair trade. It makes no pretense at unfair trade. Section 201 simply is a remedy whereby American producers can get relief if foreign competition is successful and if the injured American producers can show they are losing jobs because of imports.

It has nothing to do with unfair trade. In a sense, it has to do with successful trade. Granted, we are concerned about Americans losing their jobs, and we have assistance programs to give them some cushion. But is there anybody here who cannot imagine that we might be willing to eliminate those protective barriers in return for the elimination of similar barriers in Europe, Japan, Korea, or China? Or that we might find a better way to compensate and protect injured companies, perhaps through trade adjustment assistance?

This whole debate, the whole title of the amendment, the whole preamble to the amendment, is about unfair trade. Yet probably the most important laws covered by this amendment has nothing to do with unfair trade.

Am I in favor of unilaterally waiving every 201 right in America? The answer is "No." But my point is that if we could eliminate similar barriers against American exports, can no one imagine the possibility there might be an agreement that would be advantageous to everybody? Yet no such agreement could ever be consummated under the Dayton-Craig amendment because nobody would negotiate the elimination of their protective safeguard against American exports unless we eliminate or modify our Section 201 provision. Negotiation in this area would be a nonstarter.

As I said when I started my remarks, our need for fast track arose in the Kennedy Round, when President Kennedy recognized that the greatest impediment to trade was no longer tariffs but domestic laws that limited trade. It was when he tried to change those laws that Congress came in and changed the deal. The Kennedy Round went into effect without our being a party to it, all because of the issues that are raised by the amendment before the Senate. The Round died for exactly the issue that are listed here in the Dayton-Craig amendment. The recognition that you cannot change a negotiated deal after the fact is what led to enactment of fast track. Senator BAUCUS and I were involved in negotiations the other day. There are a lot of things in that final deal I really do not like. But I do not have the right to go back after the fact and say Senator BAUCUS gave up on items A, B, C, D, and E, which is great, but I want to renegotiate and change our deal. I do not have a right to do that. A deal is a deal. That is the very issue the Senate is dealing with here.

The next provisions of law covered by the Dayton-Craig amendment are chapters 2, 3, and 5 of title II of the Trade Act of 1974. This is the fourth so-called unfair trade protection provision. Yet as one reads those chapters, they have nothing to do with unfair trade. They simply have to do with the assistance provided to companies and workers negatively affected by imports or by a company's shift in production. Some may not favor shifts in production, but when did it turn into an unfair trade practice? Every day, Americans are moving investments from one country to another. We are the world's largest investor. In fact one of the things we are trying to do in the underlying bill is to get other countries to allow investment in America and allow greater freedom for American investments in their country.

Even if a shift in production were an unfair trade practice, how could we say to countries that we want to negotiate away prohibitions you have against producing in the United States, but we aren't willing to do the same? Remember when we had the big battle with Japan over autos? We wanted them to produce some of their automobiles in America, and we negotiated over it, and in fact they did increase production here. But why would they ever negotiate if we have said in advance that we are not willing to eliminate prohibitions against plant relocation in our own country? Why should the Japanese allow companies to move out of Japan or set up programs that impede the process if we are not willing to do it?

I could go on at length about the other laws covered by this amendment. The amendment is written very broadly. It may list 5 bills in particular, but it is written so broadly that in my opinion it covers at least 18 other laws that are part of current trade law: for example, section 1317 of the Omnibus Trade and Competitive Act of 1988; the Antidumping Act of 1916; the Continued Dumping and Subsidy Offset Act of 2000; section 516A of the Tariff Act of 1930; section 129 of the Uruguay Round Agreements Act; and the list goes on. The plain truth is, given the way it is written, not even the authors of this amendment truly know what it does.

I will conclude by making some final points. I understand the need for consensus. We do not get to write these bills by ourselves. It requires give and take. My belief, and the belief of the vast majority of members of the Republican Conference in the Senate, is that we have given. We gave on health benefits that are not paid for, that we think represent bad public policy, that take away from poor working people to give to relatively high income, nonworking people. We gave on 2 years of wage guarantee benefits for people affected by trade. Meanwhile, somebody who lost their job because of a terrorist attack gets 6 months of unemployment, no health benefits, and no wage insurance benefits. We are getting to the point where we have already paid for the trade bill, and if this amendment passes on top of those payments, we will not be getting a bill at all.

The principal ingredient of trade promotion authority—in fact the heart of it, in its purest form—is very simply the right of the President, within the parameters we set out in law, to go out and negotiate a trade agreement and bring it back and subject it to a yes-or-no vote in Congress. We do not have the right to amend a trade agreement; we simply have to take the whole thing or reject the whole thing. That is what trade promotion authority, or fast track, is. Yet the pending amendment says the President does not get an up-or-down vote because in some 23 different areas of law, many of which have absolutely nothing to do with unfair trade, we can have a separate vote and if a majority votes to make a change, then the trade agreement is modified. Under those circumstances, nobody will negotiate with us and the President effectively does not have fast-track authority.

So what we have is a bill that claims to be about fast-track authority, which is a single take-it-or-leave-it vote on a deal. And yet we have an amendment before us that eliminates that provision and requires a separate vote on things in the agreement that we do not like.

I do not see how the two can be reconciled. It seems to me that when you are voting for this amendment, you are voting against trade promotion authority. I do not think you can have it both ways. You cannot say on the one hand that we will give the President the right to get his agreements voted on up or down, take it or leave it, yes or no; and then on the other hand say we can adopt an amendment that says but of course on some 23 different provisions of law we don't have to take it or leave it, we can change it.

Today, through a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Trade Representative, the President rightfully has indicated that he will veto the bill if the Dayton-Craig amendment is included in it.

To conclude, we paid a very heavy price to get fast track, and this amendment takes fast track away. Rather than pay all these new tributes—the expanded trade adjustment assistance, these new health benefits that are not paid for, the new entitlements that are not paid for, this wage insurance that smells very much like the programs that are killing some European countries that have not created a net new job in countries in 20 years—we are quickly reaching the point where even the strongest proponents of free trade have to say this amendment breaks the axle of the wagon. Even the strongest proponents are saying that with all else we paid to get a vote on the trade promotion authority bill, if this amendment is in the bill it means we don't have trade promotion authority, so why pay for all the other things?

I urge my colleagues as we try to find a solution to this problem. That solution might be a compromise in which we set up an oversight committee to allow those concerned about these laws to monitor negotiations, and provide 90 days' notice of any potential trade agreement that changed any of these laws. There are many ways we can enhance the ability of Members to be involved and get advance notice to allow them build political opposition. I hope those who want to pass this bill will find a way to get around this dilemma.

We are already at the point that given what we are already paying for this bill, it almost is not worth it. I believe that at this point, many Republican Members of the Senate are holding their nose and saying: OK, we have to do a bunch of bad things, but we will get trade promotion authority and maybe some of the bad things will be addressed in conference. But over and over bills have gotten worse, not better, in conference. If you are for trade promotion authority, if you want the deal we put together to work, I believe we need help in finding a way to respond to the concerns raised without providing for a separate vote, because a separate vote destroys trade promotion authority.

If the two Senators who offered the amendment wanted to be on the oversight committee for the Senate, I would be willing to write the bill to make sure they were put on it. I don't have any objection to oversight and I am for notice. Then, if people were getting ready to vote against a fast-tracked trade agreement, they could tell the President that if he makes these changes, he is jeopardizing my vote. And they would have 90 days to build up an alliance to lobby against it. When "lobbying" is mentioned people say oh gosh, that's terrible, terrible. But making your voice heard is a good thing guaranteed under the Constitution.

But what we cannot agree to without killing the underlying bill is Congress' ability to change the trade agreement once it has been negotiated. The President must be able to say to our trading partner that a deal is a deal; not that wait, it was a deal, but the part we agreed to that we did not like is not a deal because 51 Members of the Senate decided to amend it.

I accept and am for the process whereby 51 Members of the Senate can defeat the implementing bill for a trade agreement. I have never voted against an implementing bill, although I can imagine a trade agreement that I would think was so bad that it was not worth it. I believe I ought to have the right to vote no. And I have that right under fast track or trade promotion authority. But I do not have the right to change the deal.

This amendment would allow Congress to change the deal, which is why it is a killer amendment. It is the antithesis to what trade promotion authority is about. You cannot be for trade promotion authority, which is a single vote on the deal, and then be for an amendment that allows votes to amend the deal. I don't see why the people who are for this amendment don't simply vote against the bill, and let those who are for it have a chance to vote for it. The Dayton-Craig amendment would gut that process. It would leave the Senate in the unhappy position of having a fast track bill that includes an amendment that undoes fast track.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON). The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, I have listened intently to my colleague, the senior Senator from Texas. The reason I do that and I have done that for a good many years, I always learn a great deal. I am always extremely cautious to get on the floor and debate in opposition to a position held by my colleague from Texas, with his skill but, most importantly, his knowledge in this area. It is very important. I hope all listen.

I was taking notes as if I were a student at Texas A&M and he were the economics professor. In fact, that is what we heard today, a rather professorial statement about the ideals of trade in an ideal environment. I disagree not with that statement.

I also agree with the historical perspective that he offered from the 1960s through the 1970s and the Kennedy Round and the circumstances the world found itself in and the need for us to change from being the exclusive holder in a constitutional Republic of the right to determine international commerce flows to one where we delegated that thought by law to the executive, in a great more detail. That, of course, is what we did with fast track. That was the 1960s and the 1970s.

Through that period of the 1970s, 1980s and 1990s, the world changed a great deal—really all for our betterment in the broad sense. As economies changed and we invested in world economies, there is no question that the economic engine of the United States drove the world and took a lot of poor countries and made them more prosperous. Part of it was because we allowed access to our markets while at the same time we promoted their markets and invested in their countries. All of that is true, and it will be every bit as true tomorrow and a decade or two from now as it was then. I don't disagree with that.

What I am suggesting is in the year 2002, as we once again search for a way to promote trade, we take a nearly 40-year-old model and say it works, it fits, it is the right thing to do again. Is it the right thing for us to—almost in an exclusive way—delegate full authority to the executive branch in an area that is constitutionally ours? I believe it is. I believe it is with certain conditions that are very limited and very direct. I don't believe they change the dynamics of a relationship and ultimately a negotiation.

It is very difficult to blend a parliamentary government's negotiators and what they understand their role is with that of a constitutional Republic. I know; I have been there. I have seen the frustration of the European parliamentarian who cannot understand why the President's men or women cannot speak for the United States and cut a deal and confirm it and that is the way it will be if the President signs off on it.

The reason they can't is because of us and because of a little item we call the Constitution. While we have delegated that authority by law, we have also said it has to come back here on an up-or-down vote.

What Senator DAYTON and I do is go a slight step further and say that in those areas that are fixed by law, law that we created, you have to come back to us. And not under this sweeping environment and nostalgia and euphoria of a trade package that is going to spin the world into greater economies are we going to pick apart an agreement. What we are saying is simply this. We are saying that you, Mr. President, and your team must come back as advocates and sales men and women. As you sell the whole package, you have to sell a few of the parts.

I hope, ultimately, when we see a conference report, it has a 90-day notification in it that sets the Congress to task in the sense that it notifies it that they will be making some change in current law and we are preparing ourselves, we are looking at it, we are making decisions, and the President's men and women are here on the Hill advocating and saying: It is a quid pro quo: For a reduction here, we get this here; for a reduction in our subsidies in agriculture, the Europeans are going to reduce their subsidies, they are going to take away some of their hidden barriers, and we are going to have greater access to markets.

I think that would sell here in the Senate. I think it would work. I think you could find 50 plus 1 who would support that.

But you have to sell it. We have delegated the authority of negotiation, but we have not delegated the authority and the conditions of final passage. That alone is ours under the Constitution. That is why this is an important debate and, while it may change the character from the historic perspective of fast track, I do not believe it neuters, I do not believe it nullifies, I do not believe it causes our negotiators more encumbrance as they sit down at the table.

That is because right upfront the terms are understood. It does not deny them the right to negotiate anything. Everything is on the table. What it does say to the executive branch of Government is: Come home and sell your product. Come home and convince Congress you have done the right thing and here are all the tradeoffs and the alternatives. Because on the whole Congress agrees with the Senator from Texas: Trade for the whole of our economy and for job creation is very important.

Earlier in the day when I was debating the initial Dayton-Craig amendment as offered, I talked about Idaho's economy. We have to have trade. I know we have to have trade. I am going to work to get trade. But I want to tell the Senator from Texas that a good number of years ago a young man from Texas came to Idaho. He had been from Idaho originally but was working in Texas at a company called Texas Instruments, a little old high-tech company that became a big old powerful, important, and valuable high-tech company. He came home to Idaho, and he convinced a group of investors to go with him and his brother because they had a better idea about how to build memory chips.

They got a group of investors together, and they built a fab, and they started producing memory chips—late 1980s, early 1990s. They were doing a great job building a DRAM memory chip, selling it to the world, and then all of a sudden came the Japanese aggressively into the market, deciding they wanted the market, they were going to control the market. They had built great fab—or fabrication capacity—and they were dumping in our markets. And down went that little company in Idaho.

They came to me and others from Idaho. We went to a President—George Bush—and said: President Bush, if you do not help us, this little company is going to be destroyed and we are going to lose all of our memory chip capacity in this country. There were futurists saying this was the loss of the new intelligentsia, of the U.S. economy, and if we lost this and gave it away to the Japanese, we would never have this new economy.

The then-President Bush stepped in and said: You are right, and he stuck an antidumping clause against the Japanese—backed them off. At that little fledgling company in Idaho, the lights went back on, they began to produce chips again. Now they are an organization known as Micron. They employ 30,000-plus people. They produce 40 percent of the memory chips of the world. They are Idaho's major employer. And they are in other States. They just bought a fab in Virginia.

But for a moment in time, the President of the United States used antidumping provisions and stopped the Japanese and, in part, shifted the world. From that moment through the decade of the 1990s, until today, this country has led in the area of new technologies. It truly was the economy of the 1990s, in part—a small part but an important part—because we helped shape a marketplace and we disallowed government-sponsored, government-supported manufacturers in other countries from dumping in the world market and, most importantly, in our market.

That is why these tools are important. If they are negotiated away, then it is phenomenally important for this Congress to speak to it. Nowhere do we say they cannot be brought to the table. Nowhere does the Dayton-Craig amendment say they cannot be negotiated. It simply says to the negotiators, our negotiators: You have a job to do. You have a very important job to do, and that is to sell it. And the same logic that sells the whole trade package, 50-plus-1 votes here in this body, blocks a point of order on any changes in trade law. That seems to be reasonable. That seems to be common sense.

We can go through all the provisions, and the Senator from Texas did that and expanded on them and talked about intellectual property and copyrights.

People come to the United States for the purpose of inventing so they can own a piece of their invention and profit by it. That is why we have had copyright law. That is why we have led the world and why we lead the world today in inventions, in new technologies, largely because those who create—those who create through thinking, and that materializes in the form of a useable object in the market, in the laboratory, in the manufacturing unit—can profit by that for a period of time. We protect them.

Yes, we will negotiate those items. But what we will not do is negotiate ours away. We are going to try to make the world a transparent place.

I am amazed that as the world shifted from tariff to antidumping, countervailing kinds of trade remedy laws, as is being argued here today, we would want to back ours off. I understand trading. I understand quid pro quo: You do this and we will do this. But what you do must be transparent, what you do must be enforceable, because what we do as a representative republic, by the very character of our country and the character of our laws, is open. It is done in the public eye. It is done in the arena of the international trade debates.

At the Commission downtown—I have been there to testify; so has the Presiding Officer—we have talked about trade issues. We have talked about agricultural policy. We have argued before the Commissioners to make sure that the findings are correct and they are right. We have been there on Canadian-related issues.

The only reason we are allowed to go is that we have the law so that ultimately, if wrongdoing is found, if dumping is found, there is a remedy. That remedy usually allows us to cause the other country to comply, to come into balance with us. That is what is important here, isn't it? That is what helps our farmers. It doesn't protect them, it helps them. It allows competition in a fair market. It doesn't protect and isolate our manufacturing jobs. It balances it. We hope it makes them competitive.

We had a vote just a few moments ago, and 60 Senators at least disagreed with the motion to table the Dayton-Craig amendment. Here is probably the reason. Let me read this for the record, and then I will step down because others are here to debate.

During the Doha Round of the WTO in Qatar last year, we know our trade ambassador largely believed he was forced to put on the table, as a negotiable item, our trade remedy provisions. We in the Senate were concerned about that. On May 7 of last year, here is what we said:

> Dear Mr. President:
>
> We are writing to state our strong opposition to any international trade agreement that would weaken U.S. trade laws.
>
> Key U.S. trade laws, including antidumping law, countervailing duty law, Section 201, and Section 301, are a critical element of U.S. trade policy. A wide range of agricultural and industrial sectors has successfully employed these statutes to address trade problems. Unfortunately, experience suggests that many other industries are likely to have occasion to rely upon them in future years.

Why? Because of a changing, growing, maturing world economy there will be competitors out there. Let's make sure they are fair.

> Each of these laws is fully consistent with U.S. obligations under the World Trade Organization and other trade agreements.

Let me repeat: Each of these laws is consistent with U.S. obligations under the World Trade Organization and other trade agreements.

> Moreover, these laws actually promote free trade by countering practices that both distort trade and are condemned by international trading rules.
>
> U.S. trade laws provide American workers and industries the guarantee that, if the United States pursues trade liberalization, it will also protect them against unfair foreign trade practices and allow time for them to address serious import surges. They are part of a political bargain struck with Congress and the American people under which the United States has pursued market opening trade agreements in the past.
>
> Congress has made clear its position on this matter. In draft fast track legislation considered in 1997, both Houses of Congress have included strong provisions directing trade negotiators not to weaken U.S. trade laws.

Some of those provisions are in the current document here on the floor to which we are offering an amendment.

> Congress has restated this position in resolutions, letters, and through other means.
>
> Unfortunately, some of our trading partners, many of whom maintain serious unfair trade practices, continue to seek to weaken these laws. This may simply be posturing by those who oppose future market opening, but—whatever the motive—the United States should no longer use its trade laws as bargaining chips in trade negotiations nor agree to any provisions that weaken or undermines U.S. trade laws.
>
> We look forward to your response.
>
> Sincerely—

And it is signed by 62 Members of the Congress, Democrat and Republican alike.

What we are offering today in the Dayton-Craig amendment is fully consistent with the letter we sent to the President last May 7. The vote we had an hour or so ago to table the Dayton-Craig amendment is almost to the vote similar to this letter. In other words, I do not believe the Senate has changed its mind. I think the President has a very clear message.

But what is most important is not our President. We want him to negotiate. We want him to put the items on the table. We want him to engage the world. We want to trade. We want our producers to produce for a world market. What we do not want is an agreement struck that is impossible to take. What we do want is for the rest of the world to know that we will, in some ways, protect and provide for the American, the U.S. economy in a way that allows us to prosper while allowing other countries entry into our economy, and we hope they will allow us into theirs, and in fair, balanced, and equitable processes.

That is what is at issue. I believe that is the essence of the debate. Idealism has its place. Academic arguments are critically important. But today we talk about the practical application of the law and our constitutional responsibility, and the impact it has on my farmers and my ranchers and my working men and women, who, like me, believe they have to trade in a world market to stay economically alive.

I yield the floor.

Mr. DAYTON. Will the Senator yield for a brief question?

Mr. CRAIG. Yes, I am happy to yield.

Mr. DAYTON. The Senator raised an excellent point which I had not thought of until the Senator made the point: 62 Senators signed that letter. Sixty-one Senators voted today in support of the Craig-Dayton amendment. And the one Senator who was necessarily absent was a cosponsor of that amendment.

So does the Senator believe, then, this sends a message when 62 Senators sign a letter that they mean what they say?

Mr. CRAIG. I thank the Senator from Minnesota. The point is well taken.

I yield the floor.

Mr. DORGAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. REID addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask my friend from North Dakota to yield to me without losing his right to the floor.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Nevada without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I very much appreciate my friend for yielding.

What I want to say is that we have an amendment now before the Senate. I believe we should act on this matter. I have told my friend, the Senator from Iowa, we are not going to do anything as long as he is on the floor. But I would say, through him to my friend from Texas, my dear friend, Senator GRAMM, that if he wants to filibuster this amendment, he is going to have to have a real filibuster. He is not going to be able to come and go from the floor because we have to move on.

I know his heart is in the right place, "his heart" meaning Senator GRAMM's heart is in the right place. But we have had a vote this morning that shows 61 Senators are in favor of this amendment. It would seem to me we should move on this amendment and go on to something else.

I spoke to the Senator from North Dakota earlier today. He has at least four or five very substantive amendments. I think we should get on to those. I have spoken to other Senators who have amendments. I know there are approximately 10 amendments from the other side. And it is being held up.

I repeat, if the Senator from Texas wants to conduct a filibuster, he is going to have to conduct a real, honest filibuster, not just tell us he is going to talk a lot on this. If I did not have the relationship I have with my friend from Iowa—and I hope we can work something out—we would have moved the question when the Senator—not this Senator was off the floor but when the Senator from Texas was off the floor.

So I hope we can move forward. There are a number of people who are not real anxious to move this legislation at all. And my friend from Texas, who claims he is in favor of it, is working into the hands of those who do not want to move the legislation. It is kind of a unique twist of logic, as far as I am concerned. I know my friend from Texas is very logical. He has the mind of an academic. And I understand that. But being very base about all this, there are certain parliamentary rules in the Senate, and we are going to stick to them. We are not going to have a gentleman's filibuster. It is going to be a real filibuster or no filibuster.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada makes an interesting point about the difficulty of getting a vote even on amendments that have wide support.

Nearly a week and a half ago I offered my amendment dealing with chapter 11 of NAFTA, to deal with the issue of secret multinational tribunals that consider trade bases behind closed doors. This was an amendment that was bipartisan, and had wide support. I offered my amendment, and there was a tabling motion. We had 67 Members of the Senate vote against tabling, and then we could not get the amendment adopted. A number of days elapsed where we just could not get the amendment adopted.

It appears the same thing is happening here. The same Member of the Senate is doing it. He certainly has a right to do that, but as the Senator from Nevada says, if somebody wants to filibuster this, then let him come to the floor and bring a pitcher of water, get some comfortable shoes on, and stand here for a few hours.

But what I hope we will do is adopt the Dayton-Craig amendment. It is quite clear, from the evidence of the vote on tabling a while ago, that this amendment will pass by a very significant margin. And the sooner the better.

I tell you, I listened, at great length, to my friend from Texas. I must say that I actually taught economics in college for a couple years, but I was able to overcome that experience and go on to lead a different life.

The issue that is before us is not about economic theory. It is about the reality of trade relationships we have with other countries—and what real remedies we have to address that unfair trade.

I am sure there are people listening to this debate or watching this debate, and they think this all sounds like a foreign language: CVD, antidumping, 301, 201, chapter 11.

But trade issues can and should be discussed in terms of how they impact real people. This debate is about real people in our country that decide to form a company, to produce a product and market it, and then have to contend with foreign competition. I have no problem with fair competition—I welcome it. But when our producers' competitors overseas are exploiting the labor of a 12-year-old for 12 cents an hour locked in a garage 12 hours a day, is that fair competition?

Take a person who works in a manufacturing plant and has worked there 22 years, is an honest employee, has committed his or her life to that employer, only to discover that next month the identical product is coming in from Bangladesh or Sri Lanka or Indonesia, produced by children working 12 hours a day or 14 hours a day, getting just cents per hour. Fair competition?

American workers are told that they cannot compete. You, Mr. and Mrs. America, can't compete because working in this factory we have 12-year-olds who will work for less money than you will. They live in countries where it is all right to work them 12 hours a day and pay them $2 at the end of a day. That is not fair competition.

The issue is, what are the remedies? What can we do about that? Should we be able to do something about it? Should our trade laws allow our companies and our workers to do something about trade that they think is fundamentally unfair?

The answer clearly ought to be yes. If the answer is not yes, then just forget about the past 100 years of history dealing with labor and other issues.

There are people who died on the streets in America some three-quarters of a century ago, during the struggle of American labor to get the right to organize and form labor unions. There are people who risked their lives in this country because they demanded that we have a safe workplace. There are people who risked their jobs and their lives fighting for the issue of child labor laws so we could take kids out of the coal mines.

The fact is, we worked on all of these issues for a long time. Over a century this country had to digest these issues. Should we have a requirement for a safe workplace? Should we have child labor laws so people aren't putting 8 and 10 and 12-year-olds down in the mines? Should we have a requirement of a minimum wage? Should we have the right to organize as workers? The answer to all of those issues has been yes. But it was never an easy yes. It took this country decades to get through those discussions and debates. As I said, there were some people who died on the streets during the violence that ensued over those debates.

A century later we have some who say, let's just get a big old pole and pole vault over all those issues and act as if they don't exist. Because you can start a company and you don't have to worry about that. You don't have to worry about whether you hire kids. Just go to another country and hire kids. You don't have to worry about paying a decent wage. You can go somewhere else and pay them 24 cents an hour to put together canvas bags so they can be shipped to Fargo or Los Angeles or Pittsburgh. You don't have to worry about dumping chemicals and pollutants into the streams and the air. Just move your factory somewhere else where they don't have environmental laws, laws that protect the drinking water and the air. You can just pole vault over all of that and decide to move all these jobs somewhere.

The person who is working in that factory and has been there 22 years says: Wait a second. What has happened to my job?

That person is told: Your job is gone, my friend. Your job is somewhere else because you were too expensive. There are kids who will work for less money in another country. They will work all the overtime hours they are told to work, and they have no recourse.

I happen to believe that expanded trade and fair trade is good for this country. I think it enhances this country. It increases the opportunity for a better economy. But I don't think we can talk about fair trade without addressing the issues I am describing.

We have a lot of people in our country who work hard all day, every day. To be told that somehow they can't compete because someone else can produce that product at a fraction of the price because they don't have to follow any rules, anyplace, anytime, that is not fair trade.

What we have is a situation where globalization is here. No one is attempting to turn back globalization. It is a fact of life today in the world. This is a globalized economy. The question isn't whether globalization. The question is what are the rules for globalization. What are the rules for the global economy?

There is an admission price to this marketplace, and that is fair trade. That is part of what we are trying to define with respect to the rules of the global economy.

My colleagues, Senators DAYTON and CRAIG, have offered an amendment. It is a fairly straightforward amendment. It says that if and when the next trade agreement is negotiated under fast track rules and brought back to the Congress, we ought to have the right to have a separate vote on any provision that diminishes the protections we now have to take action against those who engage in unfair trade practices against our businesses and against our workers.

If they do anything behind a closed door in some foreign land where they negotiate a trade agreement to diminish our protection to take action against unfair trade, we reserve the right to have a separate vote on it.

Let me show you what Mr. Zoellick said in Doha, Qatar. I wonder how many of the Members of the Senate could point to Doha on a world map. I will tell you why this ministerial meeting was held in Doha: Because they couldn't hold it anyplace else. You have to find a place that is very hard to find and has very few hotel rooms in order to avoid the people who will demonstrate against these trade agreements these days. So they picked Doha, Qatar.

Last November at the ministerial meeting, Trade Representative Zoellick agreed that U.S. antidumping laws could be discussed as a new trade round gets underway.

Why is this important? Well, we have laws that say to other countries and other producers, you can't dump your products into this country. You can't, for example, produce a product that costs you $100 to produce and dump it in the American marketplace for $50 apiece to undercut the American producer.

My colleague from Texas said: Gee, that is a good thing, isn't it, that they are going to send a $100 product over here and sell it for $50.

Well, I guess it is a good thing if you don't lose your job as a result of it. I don't know of one Senator or one Member of the House who has ever lost a job because of a bad trade agreement. Just name one, just one man or woman serving in the Senate or House who has ever lost their job because of a bad trade agreement. It is just folks out there who work all day in factories being closed because of bad trade agreements who lose their jobs.

That is not theory. Those are broken dreams. Somebody coming home from work having to say: Honey, they told me I have lost my job today because I can't compete. I can't compete with 50 cents an hour wages, working 12-hour days in a factory where they don't have to worry about pollution. That is what antidumping laws try to remedy.

What Senators DAYTON and CRAIG say with this amendment is very simple: If you want to negotiate an agreement, Mr. Trade Ambassador, that negotiates away our antidumping laws, then Congress has a right to have a separate vote on that provision pertaining to our trade laws. Because this Congress is not any longer going to allow you to dilute or delete the protections and remedies which we have to deal with unfair trade.

I have spoken at length in this Chamber about my concern about our trade policy. We have a trade deficit that is growing and growing and no one cares a whit about it: Over $400 billion a year. Every single day we add over $1 billion to our trade deficit and our current accounts balance.

We used to have debates about deficits in this Chamber, about fiscal policy deficits when the budget deficit was $290 billion and going in the wrong direction. We would have debates, we would have people doing handstands and cartwheels about how awful it was. Not a word about the trade deficit.

One can make the case in theory that the budget deficit is a deficit we owe to ourselves. One cannot make that case about the trade deficit. The trade deficit is going to be paid for by a lower standard of living in America's future, and over $1 billion a day every single day we are adding to the merchandise trade deficit.

This trade policy of ours is not working. We cannot load ourselves up with debt and choke on this trade debt and say: Boy, this is a good thing; this is really working well.

I have been very critical of our trade ambassadors, Republicans and Democrats, for not having the backbone to take action when we see unfair trade. We now have remedies that are not used. Even when they use remedies, I always scratch my head and think: What a strange approach.

We have a little dispute with Europe. The dispute is with respect to beef produced with hormones that are banned in Europe. We went to the WTO, and the WTO ruled in our favor. But Europe said: Fly a kite. Europe would not comply with the WTO requirement, and so we took action against Europe.

Mr. President, do you know what we did to Europe? Our negotiators said: We are imposing sanctions on imports of truffles, Roquefort cheese, and goose liver. That will sure strike fear in the hearts of competitors. Those engaged in unfair trade ought to know from here on forward, America takes tough action to deal with goose liver imports.

My point is, our country does not stand up for its economic interest in international trade very often, and to weaken the remedies that already exist—they did that under the United States-Canada agreement and under NAFTA. Section 22 used to be helpful to us. Not anymore. Section 301 is weakened and diminished as an area of trade protection.

It is interesting, I pointed out the antidumping laws we now have are on the trading block. Our allies who want to get rid of these antidumping laws in our country will negotiate them away, if they can. And by the way, they will do that in secret because the American public and Congress will not be there when it is done. It will be done, in most cases, in a foreign land behind a closed door. They will bring it back here and say: you have one vote on it, yes or no, and it deals with a broad range of issues and you cannot get at the antidumping provision we traded away because you just get a yes or no on the entire product. That is why Senators DAYTON and CRAIG say this is not the right thing to do.

I was interested to hear, this morning, one of my colleagues talk about all of the trade problems we have, as if to suggest we should blame ourselves for the problems. We have trouble getting high-fructose corn syrup into Mexico. So that is our problem? I do not think so. That is Mexico's fault. Grain coming in from Canada by the Canadian Wheat Board unfairly subsidized, that is our problem? Not where I sit it is not. That is Canada's unfair trading practice. I could go on and list a dozen more. Seventy percent tariff on wheat flour into Europe, is that fair? I do not think so.

I cannot even begin to talk about our trade problems with China. And it's not just unfair trade, it's also about badly negotiated trade agreements.

A year-and-a-half-ago, we negotiated a bilateral agreement with China. The United States agreed that after a long phase-in with respect to automobiles, any Chinese cars that are sent to the United States will be subject to a 2.5-percent tariff on them. Any U.S. cars that are sent to China will be subject to a 25-percent tariff.

So we have a 2.5-percent tariff on the Chinese cars coming into our market, but the Chinese can impose a tariff that is 10 times higher on U.S. cars into China. You ask: How did that happen? Because our negotiators negotiated away the store. It is the same squishy-headed nonsense our negotiators do every time they negotiate.

Will Rogers once said—I have told my colleagues this many times—the United States of America has never lost a war and never won a conference. He surely must have been thinking of our trade negotiators. They seem to manage to lose within a week or two of leaving our shores.

Whenever I talk about trade, someone will call my office and say: you are a protectionist. I am not. If protectionism means standing up for America's economic interest, then count me in, sign me up, that is what I want to do but I am not asking for anything special for anybody. I want all our people to have to compete—farmers, businesses, and others. But I want the competition to be fair, and if the competition is not fair, then I want the remedies available to address that unfairness. Those remedies have been weakened dramatically, and they will be weakened further, mark my words, in the next set of negotiations.

This amendment is not in any way, as some have said, a killer amendment. That is not what this amendment is about. If my colleagues want to stand up for American jobs and demand fair trade and demand the remedies that will get you to fair trade, then it seems to me they have an obligation to support this amendment.

I was pleased with the last tabling vote because it showed an overwhelming number of Members of the Senate understand this issue and are no longer going to sit quietly by and say: You go ahead and negotiate. Get on an airplane, go someplace, roll up your shirt sleeves, and negotiate. Whatever you come back with, that is fine, we will handcuff ourselves. You can negotiate away our antidumping laws; you can trade away our remedies; and we will agree to handcuff ourselves and not have a vote on it.

I believe the Senate is finally saying to those who will listen: We are not willing to do that.

I did not support providing fast-track trade authority to President Clinton, and I do not support giving it to President Bush. I say to this administration, as I said to the past administration: Negotiate agreements and you will do so with my best wishes. And I hope you will negotiate good agreements for our country, agreements that stand up for our economic interest, and agreements that demand that the rules for that competition be fair. Then come back, and when you see unfair trade, be willing to stand up, have the guts to stand up for this country's interest.

The reason there is so much anger about trade these days—we see it in the streets during these ministerials, and we hear it in the debates—is because we are so anxious to negotiate the next agreement and so unwilling to enforce the last agreement.

We have done so many agreements with Japan that nobody can even find the agreements. USTR cannot find all the agreements the United States has with Japan, let alone enforce them. We have something like eight to nine people in the Department of Commerce enforcing our trade agreements with respect to China. The same is true with respect to Japan, eight or nine people. Why? Because this country is not serious about enforcing trade laws. This country is serious only about negotiating the next agreement and not caring how many people lose their jobs because of unfair trade that results from that agreement.

My beef with trade is that, A, we negotiate bad agreements and, B, we consistently fail and in most cases refuse to enforce the agreements we do negotiate.

I will conclude by saying this: We have, for the 50 or so years following the Second World War, largely dealt with trade as a matter of foreign policy. For the first 25 years after the Second World War, it was not a problem dealing with trade as foreign policy. This country could tie one hand behind its back and beat anybody at any time in almost anything in international trade. So our concessions in trade to almost every country were concessions that reflected the struggle that economy was having and our ability to help them in that struggle.

The second 25 years after the Second World War, our competitors became shrewd, tough international negotiators. Our trade policy must change to be a trade policy that demands the rules of fair competition, and is no longer about foreign policy.

There is one issue in recent days that demonstrates that trade is still, in many cases, foreign policy, and that is with Cuba. Cuba is a communist country, no question about that. So is China. So is Vietnam. We have people traveling back and forth to China and Vietnam. We trade with China and Vietnam, but we have a 40-year failed embargo with Cuba. Until I and a couple of others from this Chamber fought to get food shipped to Cuba, we could not even ship food to Cuba. Cuba could not buy food from us. That did not hurt Castro. He never missed a meal. It hurt poor, sick, and hungry people. That has finally changed, except we have some people in the State Department who still do not want to ship food to Cuba, and they are trying to impede in every possible way American food from being sold in the country of Cuba. So once again, trade policy is not trade policy, it is foreign policy.

I think it would be smart if we could get some of the folks in the State Department to stop meddling in trade policy. They should start worrying a little more about terrorists with bombs and a little less about Cubans who want to buy beans in this country.

I have taken a long, meandering road to get to the point, but it is therapeutic to talk about these trade issues from time to time. The Dayton-Craig amendment is a very simple, straightforward amendment that this Senate ought to enact and ought to do so soon. We have now been on this amendment a good many hours. These are people who apparently support fast track but do not support the Senate imposing its will with a popular vote, as was the case on a motion to table the Dayton-Craig amendment. I hope that we can get past this and put our trade ambassador and our trading partners on notice, that we will not trade our remedies that exist against unfair trade.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

AMENDMENT NO. 3411 TO AMENDMENT NO. 3401

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, one of the greatest public health challenges we are facing in the world today is the pandemic of AIDS in Africa, increasingly in India and the subcontinent, spreading as well into China, and also the Soviet Union. It is most dramatically expressed in the neediest and the poorest countries of the world.

I think Africa has been on the minds of many of us in the Senate about how we were going to respond and how we were really going to provide international leadership. The United States has been a country that has developed a variety of different medications over the period of recent years, as well as treatment for a wide variety of different kinds of AIDS cases, particularly in the area of pediatric AIDS and other types of challenges that have affected those with HIV. We are now involved in responding to the real challenge of Kofi Annan and the world community in providing world leadership, in providing funding, and being replicated by other countries. We still have a long way to go, but I think many of us who have watched this develop in terms of the breadth of the support from our Members have been impressed that we are finally beginning to measure up, although I think we do have a long way to go.

Having said that, one of the great challenges that these countries have is acquiring the various kinds of prescription drugs they need. One of the issues that will be presented, should this legislation be passed and signed into law, still will be what is the availability of some of these generic drugs, which might provide a lifesaving circumstance to millions of people around the world if they are able to be produced, in these countries that do not have the resources to buy the brand name drugs.

The question has been whether these countries that are facing this kind of extraordinary crisis would be able to issue what is called a compulsory license that would permit them to buy generic drugs that are being either produced or can be produced in their own country or in another country, and that has been very much an issue. This amendment, which I would offer myself with a number of our colleagues, would make it very clear that if the country itself issued what is called a compulsory license, based upon the critical need and public health disaster they are facing, it could not be considered to be in violation of the trade laws, and they would be able to either develop that capability within the country or, for example, if we were talking about Botswana, which has a high incidence of HIV and AIDS, be able to make contracts with other countries and purchase a generic, which they would be interested in doing, as I understand, with Brazil or other nations.

It is perhaps, in many respects, one of the most important clarifications in terms of the health care crisis of HIV and of AIDS. This provision will make a very substantial difference. The cloudiness that currently surrounds this issue will be eliminated with this amendment. The amendment is very simple. It ensures those countries hit hardest by the AIDS crisis and other public health emergencies will have access to the affordable medicines to address these crises. It does this by expressing support for the Doha declaration on TRIPS and the public health as adopted by the World Trade Organization last November.

The Doha declaration was supported by Ambassador Zoellick, the pharmaceutical industry, and thousands of public health advocates and religious leaders. It is one of the most important global health issues we face today, and I am pleased we could address it in a bipartisan manner.

I will submit a more complete statement for the RECORD, but I acknowledge and thank the chairman, Senators BAUCUS, and GRASSLEY and their staffs for their willingness to consider this amendment.

I am not going to ask that the current amendment be temporarily set aside, but I had the opportunity to talk with the chairman earlier—the ranking member was not present—with his staff, and so at an appropriate time—and I will leave it up to the managers to work out what is the appropriate time—I hope this amendment might be considered favorably.

As I say, this is a matter of enormous importance and incredible consequence. It really will result in the savings of hundreds of thousands of lives. It needs to be clarified in an important way. I welcome the strong bipartisan support of my colleagues who are supportive of this proposal on both sides of the aisle. It will be enormously welcomed by the neediest countries in the world.

AMENDMENT NO. 3408

Mr. WELLSTONE. Mr. President, I rise to support this important amendment. This amendment will help preserve our trade laws by allowing Congress to exclude trade remedy provisions from any agreement receiving fast track consideration. This is extremely important at a time when our trade laws are under attack at the WTO.

Here's how it would work: Should Congress receive a trade agreement containing a provision changing current U.S. trade remedy law, the provision would be subject to a point of order. After hearing the administration's concerns about minority obstructionism, Senators DAYTON and CRAIG changed this amendment so that the point of order is now subject to a simple majority vote. Yet, still the administration opposes this amendment. It opposes the legislature of the United States having a simple up or down vote on a provision of a trade agreement that changes existing law that this body made. In fact, the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the USTR have said they would strongly recommend to the President that he veto this bill if the Dayton-Craig amendment passes.

This amendment is entirely appropriate. Given many of the trade agreements we have seen, at a minimum, this body should ensure we retain our authority and obligation to fully deliberate and debate and proposed changes to U.S. trade remedy law. The amendment would provide a critical channel through which Senators could act to prevent such undesirable agreements as the one made—in spite of our strong and vocal opposition—at the latest WTO negotiations in Doha: In May 2001, 62 Senators sent a letter to the President specifically opposing any weakening of trade remedy laws in international negotiations; in a subsequent Hill appearance USTR Zoellick made a public commitment to Senator ROCKEFELLER that the administration would not permit this to happen.

At Doha however, other WTO member countries demanded U.S. trade remedy laws be put on the table as a condition of beginning the new round. So, despite the word of the Administration that this would happen—it did. The administration broke its word to us and our trade remedy laws are on the table. With this amendment, we will send a strong message directly to other WTO countries and the administration that the U.S. Senate will not tolerate any weakening of these critical laws.

Oddly enough, while the administration continues to allow our trading partners to rewriter U.S. trade remedy laws, China refuses to even discuss theirs. Accordingly to last Friday's Inside U.S. Trade:

> China over the past week continued to resist efforts aimed at reaching agreement on timelines and procedures for information it must provide to the World Trade Organization committees in charge of reviews of its trade remedy laws that were set up as a condition of China's entry to the WTO. China charged this week that these proposed procedures go beyond the obligations of its accession commitments . . . Specifically, China, argues it is not obligated to discuss specific procedures for the reviews of its antidumping, subsidies and safeguards mechanisms.

There is absolutely no reason for us to allow the safeguards provided by our trade laws to be undermined by the concerted efforts other countries in multilateral negotiations. All of our trade remedy laws—from the antidumping and countervailing duties to the Trade Act's sections 201 and 301—are entirely consistent with WTO principles and help protect U.S. workers and producers from unfair trade practices.

At a press conference last week, USTR Zoellick said this amendment would prevent the U.S. from negotiating on trade remedies, and because this issue is a priority for U.S. trading partners, the amendment would lead these countries to refuse to negotiate at all. This statement should make it clear to all that not only does this administration believe certain countries are willing to trade with us only if they are able to weaken or undermine our trade remedy laws; but that it intends to accommodate them. By permitting a point of order against any trade agreement provisions that change our trade laws, this amendment provides an extra level of protection for these vitally important safeguards. These laws have been effectively employed in a variety of sectors to address numerous trade imbalances or to give domestic producers vital time to address major import surges.

Our spring wheat farmers in Minnesota have been struggling for years to win effective relief against cheap imports from Canada. And its not that Minnesota wheat producers cannot compete with their Canadian counterparts—it is that the Canadian system is run so very differently from ours that direct competition simply does not occur. The Canadian Wheat Board enjoys monopoly control over their domestic wheat markets. Its ability to set prices months in advance effectively insulates Canadian wheat farmers from the commercial risks that Minnesota growers are routinely exposed to, and gives their product a built-in advantage right here in our own American market. Unfortunately our softwood lumber producers have faced many of the same obstacles in competing with their Canadian counterparts. Of course we are disappointed that we were unable to informally resolve our differences with our close friend and ally. But at least we have meaningful trade remedy laws we can fall back on. The International Trade Commission and the Department of Commerce found earlier this month that our lumber industry is threatened with material injury from subsidized Canadian imports. As a result, countervailing duty and antidumping duties will be issued on these products.

Another Minnesota industry that has been immeasurably helped by these trade remedy laws is that of sugar beet production. Together with our hard working neighbors in North Dakota, our beet sugar industry is the largest in the country—an estimated $1 billion in economic benefits flows from it each year. Yet without the protection of our trade remedy laws, this industry could be in serious jeopardy. Our trading partners in the EU are one of the largest exporters of beet sugar in the world yet it is well-known that they have been heavily subsidizing their production. Our industry cannot and should not be expected to compete with such heavily subsidized imports. This is why there are antidumping and countervailing duty orders currently in effect on imported European beet sugar. As Minnesota beet sugar producers know all too well, these orders are entirely appropriate and very necessary countermeasures to the considerable subsidies that EU producers enjoy.

We cannot expect our producers to be able to compete with the unreasonably low prices that subsidies or closed, monopolistic systems produce. We look forward to the day when there is a more level playing field. But until that day comes, it is vitally important that we protect and maintain these trade remedy laws that all too often represent their only hope for much-needed relief.

As we have learned over the past decade, trade liberalization has increased the opportunities for unscrupulous countries or industries to manipulate markets through unfair trade practices. With major new agreements like the FTAA on the horizon, it is imperative that we maintain these important laws so that they can continue to be used to protect our workers and companies from the risks posed by those who seek to distort and manipulate the very markets we are seeking to open to free and fair competition.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I rise to oppose the Dayton-Craig amendment.

I have no doubt that the sponsors of the Dayton-Craig amendment have nothing but the best intentions. They believe that they are protecting the interests of the American public by walling off our Nation's trade remedy laws.

Senators DAYTON and CRAIG believe that the Congress should take a special look to determine whether a particular trade agreement undermines our trade remedy laws. These important protections include the anti-dumping and countervailing duty laws.

I understand what my friends, Senators DAYTON and CRAIG, are attempting to do with their amendment. But the trade promotion authority bill before us today already addresses their major concern—the weakening of our domestic trade laws.

The bill before us already gives clear direction to our U.S. negotiators to "avoid agreements that lessen the effectiveness of domestic and international disciplines on unfair trade." This includes dumping, subsidies, and safeguards.

Under the provisions of the Dayton-Craig amendment, a minority of this body could work to defeat future trade agreements. By raising a point of order objection, any one Senator could slow the chance for any future trade agreement and 41 Senators could effectively kill a global trade agreement signed by the President, passed by the House and supported by a majority in the Senate, for any reason—even one totally unrelated to trade laws—as long as the implementing bill contained any change, no matter how minor, to a U.S. trade law.

If this amendment were to pass and become law, the United States negotiating position would be severely weakened in any future trade talks. Our trading partners will view this amendment as a vulnerability—in essence, by passing this amendment we are outlining to our potential trading partners our greatest negotiating weakness.

If we declare U.S. trade laws off limits, I must ask if this is really the best way to encourage other countries to bring their trade laws up to U.S. standards which, most would agree are the gold standard that all countries strive to meet? But sometimes you can't get here from there immediately, and you have to take intermediate steps along the way.

While I believe that the United States has enacted and plays by a fair set of rule with respect to trade remedy laws, we should never send a signal to our neighbors that our laws cannot be improved and should not be the subject for discussion.

I have absolute faith that the President, Secretary Evans, and Ambassador Zoellick would never do anything to fundamentally undercut our trade remedy laws.

And what if I am wrong, and the administration gave away the store in a negotiation on our antidumping laws?

The remedy would be simple—the Congress would not adopt the trade treaty. The President would quickly get the message and would learn how far is too far.

While this would be harsh medicine, it would be what the doctor ordered. The Constitution gives the Congress an active role in the development of international trade policy. We are not to be a potted plant or a rubber stamp.

There is good reason to believe that we will not go down this path absent the Dayton-Craig amendment.

Let me be clear, as part of granting fast track authority to the President, Congress naturally will expect extensive consultation and notification procedures.

Success in passing TPA will require a close partnership between the executive and legislative branches of our Government. The Constitution grants Congress the authority to promote international commerce.

However, the Constitution also gives the President the responsibility to conduct foreign policy. Thus, the very nature of our Constitution requires a partnership between the executive and legislative branches of government in matters of international trade negotiations. That is what the trade promotion authority bill is all about—a partnership between the executive and legislative branches of government to enable U.S. consumers, workers and firms to be effectively represented at the negotiating table.

The current TPA bill already establishes extraordinary procedures for congressional consultations and review of negotiations involving U.S. trade remedy laws. Under the procedures outlined in this bill, the President must give an advance report to the Senate Finance and House Ways and Means Committees at least 90 days before the United States enters into a trade agreement. This report must outline any amendments to U.S. laws on antidumping, countervailing duties and safeguards that the President proposes to include in a trade implementing bill.

After the President notifies Congress of his trade negotiation intentions, the chairs and ranking members of the relevant committees then report to their respective chambers on their own assessments as to the integrity of the proposed changes to the TPA's objectives.

The effect of these provisions would be to assure that the President and the Congress are on the same page regarding proposals in trade negotiations on subsidies, dumping, and safeguards.

I might add that one need not look back very far to prove the resolve of President Bush's administration in upholding our trade laws. Just this year the President took action to save the U.S. steel industry and made a bold move to slow the unfair import of softwood lumber.

This is not an administration, in my opinion, that is looking to weaken our trade laws.

Here is what the administration has said about the Dayton-Craig amendment:

> . . . the amendment derails TPA without justification. The Bush administration has demonstrated its commitment to U.S. trade laws not through talk but through action. We have been committed not just to preserving U.S. trade laws, but more importantly, to using them. The administration initiated an historic Section 201 investigation that led to the imposition of wide-ranging safeguards for the steel industry. The administration's willingness to enforce vigorously our trade laws, in Canadian lumber and other cases, sends the clearest signal of our interest in defending these laws in the WTO.

This administration takes the trade protection laws very seriously.

The administration has also warned us about what may very likely happen if we adopt this seemingly good-government amendment.

Here is what Secretary Evans, Secretary Veneman, and Ambassador Zoellick are worried about, if we adopt this misguided amendment: "the rest of the world will determine that the U.S. Congress has ruled out even discussion of a major topic. Other countries will refuse to discuss their own sensitive subjects, unraveling the entire trade negotiation to the detriment of U.S. workers, farmers, and consumers."

It seems to me that this is a dynamic that we ought to worry about.

And I think this could very well extend to places where it can materially injure American leadership in high technology. As Ranking Republican Member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, I am particularly concerned that some nations might remain derelict, or become derelict, in their responsibilities of implementing the TRIPS provisions of GATT. These are the intellectual property provisions relating to international trade.

It is the TRIPS provisions that govern such valuable intellectual property as patents and copyrights. We know that a great deal of American inventive capacity is tied to the software, information technology, entertainment, and biotechnology industries. We are the world's leaders in these vital areas. We should not encourage or allow other nations to unilaterally enact their own Dayton-Craig-type provisions that act to allow them to delay TRIPS implementation.

All you have to do is to read the latest USTR report on special 301 with respect to intellectual property to see the potential scope of the problem. This lays out which countries need to do better in meeting their obligations under TRIPS with respect to intellectual property.

Just so everybody knows, the priority watch list countries are: Argentina; Brazil; Columbia; the Dominican Republic; the EU; Egypt; Hungary; India; Indonesia; Israel; Lebanon; the Philippines; Russia; Taiwan; and Uruguay. In addition to these countries, Ukraine continues to be listed as a priority foreign country because it has been determined by USTR that it has a particularly poor record in this area.

Dayton-Craig can only send a signal to these priority watch list countries that they can try to avoid their intellectual property responsibilities by saying that they want to take aspects of their IP laws off the table just like the United States may do with our trade remedy laws.

So it is not only the traditional sectors like farming that have a stake in this but also the most cutting edge industries that rely on patents and copyrights.

Let me say that I am a strong supporter of our trade remedy laws. In fact, I think I may have irritated a number of my colleagues on the Finance Committee and in the full Senate by helping to lead the charge on the steel issue this Congress.

It seems like my friend Senator ROCKEFELLER and I kept bumping into one another as we testified before the International Trade Commission in both the injury and remedy phases of the steel case.

I am a proponent of trade but I am against dumping of products into the United States. I know what the dumping of steel has done to 1,400 laid-off steel workers and their families in Utah.

Frankly, many of my colleagues might think my actions amounted to protectionism, but I think that the facts compelled the ITC and President Bush to conclude otherwise.

I commend the strong action that President Bush took in response to the crisis in the steel industry. The steel 201 case was an example that our trade remedy laws can work.

I part company with those who take the well-intentioned, but I think ultimately counter-productive, position that Congress should essentially get a second bite of the apple when it comes to the trade remedy laws.

I have no doubt of the good intentions behind this amendment. But seems to me that you either believe, or disbelieve, in the wisdom and integrity of the fast track process. Either we have an up or down vote on the whole package or we don't. We should not be picking and choosing in a way that invites interminable debate and innumerable amendments.

If you don't like an agreement—for any reason, not just the trade remedy laws but for the old-fashioned reason that it is just not a good thing for your state and your constituents, then by all means, vote against it.

The Dayton-Craig amendment, if adopted, will invite similar responses from our trading partners. If we try to take these matters off the table, we can only guess what matters they will deem as inviolate.

Let the trade negotiators negotiate. I have faith that no USTR—in either a Republican or Democratic administration—will ever give away the store on trade remedy laws. And, in the unlikely event that this occurs—the Constitution gives the Congress the final word.

TPA is an essential tool for sound trade expansion policy, a tool we have been without since its expiration in 1994. For over a decade, the United States has too often sat on the sidelines while other nations around the world continued to form trade partnerships and lucrative market alliances. The lack of fast track has put the United States at a disadvantage during trade negotiations.

I submit that this amendment does nothing less than hand trade opponents a tool to block future agreements that are overwhelmingly in America's interests.

I urge my colleagues to oppose the Dayton-Craig provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 3411 TO AMENDMENT NO. 3401

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Is it appropriate to send my amendment to the desk?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] proposes an amendment numbered 3411 to amendment No. 3401.

Mr. KENNEDY. I ask unanimous consent reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

(Purpose: To include the Declaration on the TRIPS Agreement and Public Health as a principal negotiating objective of the United States)

Section 2102(b)(4) is amended by adding at the end the following new subparagraph:

(C) to respect the Declaration on the TRIPS Agreement and Public Health, adopted by the World Trade Organization at the Fourth Ministerial Conference at Doha, Qatar on November 14, 2001.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, sometimes Democrats and Republicans can stand shoulder to shoulder with health advocates and industry representatives, find common ground, and develop constructive ideas to address some of the world's most pressing problems.

We can do this today by supporting the World Trade Organization's Declaration on TRIPS and Public Health, adopted at its Fourth Ministerial Conference last November in Doha. "TRIPS" stands for Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property. The TRIPS Agreement is one of the agreements maintained by the World Trade Organization. TRIPS is the final word when it comes to international patent issues.

In recent years, there has been some confusion over the TRIPS Agreement and the ability of poorer countries to gain access to affordable medicines to fight some of the worst plagues of our age—including malaria, tuberculosis, and AIDS. Many health advocacy groups, including Doctors Without Borders and the World Health Organization, as well as faith-based and secular groups like Oxfam, expressed concern that dying people in impoverished nations could not receive medicines because their countries were not being afforded the flexibility in the TRIPS Agreement to acquire them cheaply.

Developing nations facing health emergencies reported political pressure when they tried to employ compulsory licensing—that is, the temporary suspension of a drug's patent and an order to a manufacturer to produce that drug at a lower cost—or parallel importing, looking for the lowest price of a branded drug on the global market. The nations encountered threats of litigation through the WTO for trying to save the lives of their citizens. The poorest countries felt that our international trade agreements, written with the intent of lifting people out of poverty, were now being used against the poorest and most vulnerable when they needed them most.

After the anthrax scare here in Washington and the East Coast the United States raised the possibility of issuing a compulsory license for Cipro—the drug proven to kill anthrax, to ensure that an adequate supply of the drug was available at a reasonable cost. HHS Secretary Thompson discussed publicly the steps that would be taken, pursuant to the TRIPS, to issue and implement such a license. Few people in the United States would question such a move to protect our nation's public health.

Four people died from the recent anthrax outbreak in the United States. If an outbreak that results in four fatalities and another dozen infections is an emergency, what do we call a situation in which nearly 14,000 people will die every day from AIDS, tuberculosis, or malaria? If the TRIPS has the flexibility to accommodate the richest country in the world, it must be able to accommodate the poorest as well.

The global health crisis we face today is unprecedented. The World Health Organization reports infectious diseases are the leading killer of young people in developing countries. These deaths occur primarily among the poorest people because they do not have access to the drugs and commodities necessary for prevention and cure. Approximately half of infectious disease mortality can be attributed to just three diseases—HIV, tuberculosis, and malaria. These diseases cause over 300 million illnesses and more than 5 million deaths each year.

The WHO also reports that the economic burden is enormous. Africa's gross domestic product would be 32 percent greater if malaria had been eliminated 35 years ago. A nation can expect a decline in GDP of 1 percent annually when more than 20 percent of the adult population is infected with HIV. Of the nearly 40 million people infected with HIV worldwide, roughly 28 million of them live in Africa. If we are serious about promoting wealth across the globe, global health must be at the forefront.

Many poorer countries have shown that effective disease fighting strategies can reduce tuberculosis deaths five-fold. HIV infection rates can be reduced by 80 percent. Malaria death rates can be halved. But when a country has a health care budget of less than $50 per capita, the costs of the tools—and the drugs—to fight these diseases is often beyond reach. As a result, many studies estimate that 90 to 95 percent of people infected with HIV in the developing world do not have access to the medicines they need for treatment or prevention.

Recognizing the staggering global health crisis the world is now facing, the trade ministers of 142 countries decided to provide the clarity in the TRIPS Agreement that was so desperately needed. To ensure that all nations have access to lifesaving medicines, the WTO issued the Declaration on TRIPS and Public Health. Among other things, it said,

"We agree that the TRIPS Agreement does not and should not prevent Members from taking measures to protect public health. Accordingly, while reiterating our commitment to the TRIPS Agreement, we affirm that the Agreement can and should be interpreted and implemented in a manner supportive of all WTO Members' right to protect health, and in particular, to promote access to medicines for all."

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the Declaration on TRIPS and Public Health be printed in the RECORD at the end of my statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. KENNEDY. The declaration was immediately heralded across the globe as a tremendous achievement. It struck an honest balance between the legitimate interests of intellectual property protection and the preservation of public health. US Trade Representative Robert Zoellick said immediately after Doha, "The adoption of the landmark political declaration on the TRIPS Agreement and public health is a good example of developed and developing nations advancing common goals by working through issues together." He later added, "We were pleased with this process . . . and we believe this declaration affirms that TRIPS and the global trading system can help countries address pressing public health concerns."

Alan Holmer, the president of the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America also welcomed the declaration, saying, "The Declaration recognizes that TRIPS and patents are part of the solution to better public health, not a barrier to access. Without altering the existing rights and obligations under TRIPS, the declaration provides assurances that countries may take all measures consistent with the agreement to protect the health of their citizens."

I was very pleased with the adoption of this landmark declaration. Never before had the World Trade Organization taken such a bold stance that the protection of public health, particularly among the poorest in the world, was paramount. I want to commend U.S. Trade Representative Robert Zoellick for the leadership he displayed in ensuring this declaration's adoption, and WTO Director General Michael Moore for his tireless efforts in communicating the message of the declaration across the globe.

In order to ensure that the U.S. trade negotiators fully support the implementation of the Doha Declaration in future negotiations, this amendment adds a single sentence to the section on negotiating objectives for intellectual property issues—"respect the Declaration on TRIPS and Public Health, as adopted by the World Trade Organization at the Fourth Ministerial Conference at Doha, Qatar on November 14, 2001." This amendment directs our trade negotiations to support the declaration without reservation.

This amendment, as critical as it is to the health of millions around the globe, is merely a small step in addressing this overwhelming issue. The United States must play a more active role in fighting these diseases in the developing world. We must contribute significantly more to the global AIDS fund at the United Nations. We must do more to help develop the health service infrastructure in poor countries so they can deliver and administer treatment and prevention programs. We must provide more resources to USAID and private organizations to enhance micro-enterprise efforts, build local economies, and empower individuals so they can take care of themselves.

I'm pleased that this amendment can be accepted unanimously, because some issues are too important to be partisan. I want to extend special thanks to Senators BAUCUS and GRASSLEY and their wonderful staffs for their leadership, and for their willingness to work so closely with me on this issue. They know we don't always see eye-to-eye on trade issues, but they recognize the importance of this issue and I know they share my concerns. I look forward to working closely with them in the future on this critical issue.

EXHIBIT 1

WORLD TRADE ORGANIZATION MINISTERIAL CONFERENCE, FOURTH SESSION, DOHA, 9–14 NOVEMBER 2001

DECLARATION ON THE TRIPS AGREEMENT AND PUBLIC HEALTH—ADOPTED ON 14 NOVEMBER 2001

1. We recognize the gravity of the public health problems afflicting many developing and least-developed countries, especially those resulting from HIV/AIDS, tuberculosis, malaria and other epidemics.

2. We stress the need for the WTO Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights (TRIPS Agreement) to be part of the wider national and international action to address these problems.

3. We recognize that intellectual property protection is important for the development of new medicines. We also recognize the concerns about its effects on prices.

4. We agree that the TRIPS Agreement does not and should not prevent Members from taking measures to protect public health. Accordingly, while reiterating our commitment to the TRIPS Agreement, we affirm that the Agreement can and should be interpreted and implemented in a manner supportive of WTO Members' right to protect public health and, in particular, to promote access to medicines for all.

In this connection, we reaffirm the right of WTO Members to use, to the full, the provisions in the TRIPS Agreement, which provide flexibility for this purpose.

5. Accordingly and in the light of paragraph 4 above, while maintaining our commitments in the TRIPS Agreement, we recognize that these flexibilities include:

(a) In applying the customary rules of interpretation of public international law, each provision of the TRIPS Agreement shall be read in the light of the object and purpose of the Agreement as expressed, in particular, in its objectives and principles.

(b) Each Member has the right to grant compulsory licenses and the freedom to determine the grounds upon which such licenses are granted.

(c) Each Member has the right to determine what constitutes a national emergency or other circumstances of extreme urgency, it being understood that public health crises, including those relating to HIV/AIDS, tuberculosis, malaria and other epidemics, can represent a national emergency or other circumstances of extreme urgency.

(d) The effect of the provisions in the TRIPS Agreement that are relevant to the exhaustion of intellectual property rights is to leave each Member free to establish its own regime for such exhaustion without challenge, subject to the MFN and national treatment provisions of Articles 3 and 4.

6. We recognize that WTO Members with insufficient or no manufacturing capacities in the pharmaceutical sector could face difficulties in making effective use of compulsory licensing under the TRIPS Agreement. We instruct the Council for TRIPS to find an expeditious solution to this problem and to report to the General Council before the end of 2002.

7. We reaffirm the commitment of developed-country Members to provide incentives to their enterprises and institutions to promote and encourage technology transfer to least-developed country Members pursuant to Article 66.2. We also agree that the least-developed country Members will not be obliged, with respect to pharmaceutical products, to implement or apply Sections 5 and 7 of Part II of the TRIPS Agreement or to enforce rights provided for under these Sections until 1 January 2016, without prejudice to the right of least-developed country Members to seek other extensions of the transition periods as provided for in Article 66.1 of the TRIPS Agreement. We instruct the Council for TRIPS to take the necessary action to give effect to this pursuant to Article 66.1 of the TRIPS Agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, it is my intention to back the amendment. This amendment makes an important contribution to the underlying trade promotion authority bill.

Before addressing the substance of the amendment, I put it in context. The Doha ministerial held in Qatar last year was a profound breakthrough for the United States and the World Trade Organization. For the first time in many years, over 130 nations came together to launch a new round of international trade negotiations. This is no small achievement, as virtually every action taken during the Doha ministerial had to be done by consensus. These nations strongly believed a new round of international trade negotiations was in their best interests. I agree it is in their best interests, and it is in the best interests of the United States. I also think it is in our best interests to get these negotiations underway and give the President the authority he needs to negotiate the best deals for our workers and small and large businesses.

During the WTO ministerial at Doha, the members of the organization adopted a political declaration that highlights the provisions in the TRIPS agreement that provide members with the flexibility to address public emergencies, such as the epidemics of HIV, tuberculosis, and malaria. The objectives on intellectual property, which are part of this bill, were drafted before completion of the Doha ministerial. Senator KENNEDY's amendment updates these objectives to take into account the important declaration on public health made at the Doha meeting. It is a good addition to the bill. I am pleased to accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I highly compliment the Senator from Massachusetts. This is an extremely important statement. Millions of people in the world are suffering from HIV/AIDS, and the current patent the companies have, as important as it is, is a measure that should be relaxed so people in many parts of the world get assistance.

The amendment recognizes the special declaration concerning public health that was adopted last November in Doha. The special declaration provided assurance to poor countries facing the immense challenges of dealing with public health emergencies caused by pandemics of infectious diseases like HIV/AIDS, that measures necessary to address such crises in these countries can be accommodated by the WTO TRIPS Agreement, the Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights.

This assurance complements the numerous commitments that the United States Government, and its public and private sectors have made to help these countries cope with the HIV/AIDS pandemic.

WTO members also used the declaration to reaffirm their commitment to effective intellectual property standards such as those in the TRIPS Agreement. The declaration recognizes that effective intellectual property standards serve an important public health objective of stimulating development of new drugs.

I highly recommend this amendment to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. KENNEDY, numbered 3411.

The amendment (No. 3411) was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. BAUCUS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. REID. The majority leader asked me to announce there will be no more rollcall votes today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed as in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BAUCUS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MILLER). The clerk will call the roll.

The senior assistant bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, for the past several days, we have been debating the merits of granting fast-track trade negotiating authority to the President. Today, I would like to illustrate the importance of this measure and that of its companion, Trade adjustment assistance, to my home State of Montana.

Montana's role in the global economy is directly linked to our success in passing this important trade package. More importantly, if my State is to grow economically, we must secure opportunities beyond our borders.

Those opportunities represent risk, growth, change, and challenge for a State that is highly reliant on export markets and highly sensitive to imports.

Just as the founders of Montana—fur trappers, gold prospectors, cattle ranchers, hardrock miners—were driven west in pursuit of trade opportunities, so, too, must the citizens of modern Montana seek new markets. In fact, some would say that our viability in the 21st century is contingent upon our ability to expand and compete in the global marketplace.

To further this endeavor, we must negotiate responsible trade agreements that help Montana workers, business, farmers, ranchers and entrepreneurs.

At the same time we must recognize some of the problems associated with trade, which include worker dislocation or intensified competition, must also be addressed.

I believe that fast track and trade adjustment assistance are critical to economic growth and strength of Montana. Let me tell you why.

First, Montana exports nearly a half billion dollars in products a year. This includes $260 million in agricultural commodities, $100 million in industrial machinery, $24 million in chemical products, and $37 million in wood and paper products.

Second, as a key State in the Rocky Mountain Trade Corridor we are expanding more to Canada and Mexico—our first and second largest trading partners. Respectively, these countries import more than $300 and $34 million of Montana products with China, Japan, Germany, and the United Kingdom next in line.

With new trade agreements that open markets to Montana products and readjust some of the current trade inequities, my State's economy stands to grow and prosper.

Within this same context, the principle trade negotiating objective of the fast-track legislation calls on our negotiators to remove barriers that decrease market opportunities for Montana exports or distort imports that put producers at an unfair advantage. These barriers include governmental regulatory measures such as price controls and reference pricing which deny full market access for United States products.

Take, for example, the Canadian Wheat Board. The Government of Canada grants the Canadian Wheat Board special monopoly rights and privileges which disadvantage U.S. wheat farmers and undermine the integrity of the trading system.

These rights insulate producers from commercial risk because the Canadian Government guarantees its financial operations, including its borrowing, credit sales to foreign buyers, and initial payments to farmers. As a result, the Canadian Wheat Board takes sales from U.S. farmers and prices drop.

The negotiating authority granted the President that fast track is aimed at stopping these unjust trade practices.

Some folks say they don't want any new trade agreements until the old ones are fixed, I like the ring of that, but sometimes it is not terribly practical. I say, you can't fix something from the sidelines, you must be at the table. Fast track is a means to that end. If you want to fix an old agreement, clearly the other side is going to want to fix the old agreement from its perspective, too. It is never a free lunch.

The bill also strives to ensure that trade agreements afford small businesses equal access to international markets, equitable trade benefits, expanded export market opportunities, and provide for the reduction or elimination of trade barriers that disproportionately impact small business.

Let me illustrate what effective negotiations at the WTO mean for Main Street Montana.

A company in Bozeman could be able to ship more trailers for mining equipment to Latin America.

Discussion on pharmaceuticals could help companies like All American Pharmaceutical in Billings and Technical Sourcing International in Missoula.

Montana's tech corridor in Bozeman could seek clarification on European manufacturing standards for electronics, increasing market opportunity for small technology businesses.

Aviation firms such as Blue Sky Aviation in Lewistown, Garlick Helicopters and Tamarak Helicopters in the Bitteroot Valley could see a normalization in requirements for aviation products.

Medical standards could be addressed helping Glacier Cross of Kalispell enter new markets.

And Lawyer Nursery could spend less time fighting phytosanitary barriers and focus more on providing seeds and seedling trees to developing nations.

The bottom line is that good jobs will be created in Montana if we are willing to give our negotiators the strong hand needed to secure sound trade agreements.

In addition to small business owners, Montana's agricultural industry stands to benefit from sound trade agreements. For agriculture, the goal is to obtain competitive opportunities for U.S. exports of agricultural commodities in foreign markets substantially equivalent to the competitive opportunities afforded foreign exports in U.S. markets.

The fast-track bill includes a concrete set of trade objectives for agriculture that targets my five key concerns.

First, we must reduce tariffs to levels that are the same as or lower than those in the United States. These are the same tariffs that block Montana beef exports to Korea and Japan.

Second, we must eliminate all export subsidies on agricultural commodities while maintaining bona fide food aid and export credit programs that allow the U.S. to compete with other foreign export promotion efforts. As you well know, the EU maintains the lion's share of export subsidies—60 times more than the United States. How can we ever expect a level playing field if we are undersold time and again by government-backed competitors?

Third, we must allow the preservation of programs that support family farms and rural communities but do not distort trade.

Currently we are engaged in passing a new farm bill. This bill seeks to reflect and respond to the counter-cyclical nature of our farm economy. It strives to limit production through sound conservation programs and maintains trade provisions, including the Export Enhancement Program and Market Access Program, which help our products overseas.

The U.S. exported over $53 billion last year. However, our trade policy will only be effective if the commodity support and conservation programs of the farm bill are balanced. We cannot afford for one leg of the stool to be weaker than the others. Without family farmers, increased trading opportunities are irrelevant.

Fourth, we must eliminate state trade enterprises wherever possible. Montanans know far too well the effects of competing with the Canadian Wheat Board. As I mentioned above, we must bring price transparency and competition to the marketplace. The Canadian Wheat Board is nothing close to that. Anything short of this flies in the face of fair trade.

And fifth, we must develop rules to prevent unjustified sanitary or phytosanitary restrictions not based on sound science. For three decades we fought to pry open the Chinese market to Pacific Northwest wheat due to TCK. That was a real struggle. I spent a lot of time on that. It was difficult to get the Chinese to listen to us. They finally cracked open a little bit. Now we are struggling with markets in Chile and Russia that place arbitrary sanitary barriers on U.S. exports of beef, pork, and poultry.

I will closely monitor any upcoming trade negotiations to ensure that these goals are met. Further, I will not hesitate to call for the repeal of fast-track trading authority or pursuing a resolution to limit fast track, at any time during the process if these objectives are not met.

Let me share a few more points that make the case for fast track in my State. In order to address and maintain Montana's competitiveness in the global economy, the bill directs the President to preserve the ability of the U.S. to enforce rigorously its trade laws, including antidumping, countervailing duty, and safeguard laws.

Montana has benefited from these laws. These laws have been used against unfair, or a surge in, imports of softwood lumber from Canada and lamb from Australia and New Zealand. In addition, our wheat industry is considering launching a case against the Canadian Wheat Board.

These laws are not protectionist. Far from it. They simply ensure that Montana workers, agricultural producers, and firms, can compete fully on fair terms and enjoy the benefits of reciprocal trade concessions.

These laws are designed to help other countries play fair. If all countries played fair, our trade laws would not be necessary. They are there only to help make sure that when other countries are not playing by the rules of the road we have ways to protect ourselves against unfair foreign trade barriers. All our trade remedy laws, as you know, Mr. President, are totally WTO legal. They are totally consistent with WTO.

On a related note, I am often approached about the problem of a strong dollar for commodities and manufacturing. The overvalued dollar is certainly a problem, and I do not have the perfect solution today that balances these concerns with Treasury's intent to maintain a strong economy and control inflation.

However, within this bill, the administration is directed to work with our trading partners to draw up a blueprint to deal with the trade consequences of significant and unanticipated currency movements and to scrutinize whether a foreign government is engaged in a pattern of manipulating its currency to promote a competitive advantage in international trade.

Rest assured, I recognize these concerns, and I believe this is a step toward finding a solution and not an easy one to resolve but certainly a major step forward.

In Montana we know the value of preserving our environment while optimizing the use of our natural resources. At the same time, we cannot afford to compete with shoddy worker and environmental rights.

This measure brings that message to the world recognizing that trade and environmental policies are mutually supportive: That we should seek to protect and preserve the environment and enhance the international options of doing so, while optimizing the use of the world's resources. And, it promotes respect for worker rights and supports efforts to crack down on the exploitative child labor.

This bill is different from past fast-track legislation because it is the first to ever seek provisions that aim to ensure that parties to the agreements not weaken or reduce the protections afforded in their domestic environmental and labor laws as an encouragement for trade. It is a first, and major development. It also works to establish rules to prevent frivolous investor claims that contravene the public good.

I have a few words about part two of this package, the Trade Adjustment Assistance program or TAA. This is a program with a simple but admirable objective: to assist workers injured by imports to adjust and find new jobs. many Montana workers are now employed and many firms still in business thanks to TAA.

Take for example the 221 employees who lost their jobs as a result of the suspension of operations at the ASARCO lead bullion facility in East Helena. It was a bitter blow to that community when that announcement was made. Due to the decline in the mining and mineral processing industries in the Western U.S., these workers faced few prospects for re-employment in a similar sector.

Thanks to income support provided by trade adjustment assistance, and NAFTA–TAA, 50 percent of these workers are involved in or did seek training—many at the Helena College of Technology and a few at heavy equipment operating school.

They are learning everything from trucking to computer technology. Now nearly 42 percent have found full-time employment. Workers at Plum Creek Timber in Seeley Lake are similarly taking advantage of this program.

TAA is often seen as the last resort, but it also provides a chance for companies to retool. This is especially true of TAA for firms, a related program that provides assistance to over 10 small companies in Montana to help them readjust and effectively compete with imports.

With TAA for firms, Montola Growers is researching new markets for its safflower oil, Tele-Tech Corporation is designing new products and print ads for its sophisticated electronic devises, Thirteen Mile Lamb and Wool Company is designing new garments for manufacture by contract knitters, and Pyramid Lumber is improving its milling efficiency.

Without TAA for firms, we would see closed signs on many business doors. Unfortunately, more worthy projects exist than funding to support them. For that reason, I support significantly increased funding in order for this program to continue and expand its good work.

Additionally, this trade adjustment assistance bill includes a new provision that will offer up to $10,000 in cash assistance to Montana farmers and ranchers injured by imports. Let me be clear, this is a real opportunity to retool and reform a family farming operation, to make it competitive and sound, for generations to come. Like trade adjustment assistance for firms, this program is a means to keep an operation in business and keep our Montana families on their land.

One final item tucked neatly away in the TAA title is a provision to protect Montana sugarbeet growers from unfair trade practices. We all recall the black eye that stuffed molasses gave the industry, and we can not afford to suffer from such blatant circumvention again. This provision allows the Secretary of Agriculture to monitor imports of sugar to ensure that they do not circumvent the existing quota.

If they do, the Secretary will report to the President who can then "snapback" the offending commodity into the appropriate tariff line. This should send a clear message that America will no longer tolerate efforts to manipulate the trading system to the disadvantage of our sugar producers.

The trade package before us today will help Montana move toward a greater role in the global economy. I hope my colleagues will feel the same about their own constituencies and lend their support to this important matter.

Mr. President, I thank you for listening. I yield the floor and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to a period for morning business with Senators permitted to speak therein for a period not to exceed 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CARTER, MISSION TO CUBA

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, many of us have anticipated the trip of former President Carter to Cuba with a mixed sense of hope and concern. We had hoped that he would use this unique opportunity to help bring ideas of freedom and democracy to the repressed people of Cuba, just 90 miles off our shores.

However, it was amazing and disappointing for many of us to learn of Mr. Carter's visit to a Cuban biotechnology facility and his acceptance, at face value, of the assurances of communist Cuban officials there that the facility is engaged solely in medical and humanitarian pursuits.

More distressing is that former President Jimmy Carter was accorded the same privilege and courtesy extended to former Presidents who have requested top-secret intelligence briefings and situation reports on global areas of interest of the United States.

In the post-9/11 world, it is important that we as a united country protect the safety and security of our people.

Instead, what we have in Mr. Carter's visit to this biotech facility is a former President—who himself was once responsible for our foreign policy and the safety of the American people—dismissing the concerns of his own government, revealing information to which he was privy in top-secret briefings, and buying wholesale the assertions of the dictator Fidel Castro and his minions.

The words and actions of Mr. Carter at this facility are a breach of trust, and it is made even worse, in that the individual involved in that breach is one in whom the American people once placed the ultimate trust and responsibility of the Presidency.

Rather than spending his time with Fidel Castro and his henceman, I would suggest the name of at least one person Mr. Carter would be better advised to get to know.

Just a few short days ago I joined the Congressional Cuba Political Prisoner Initiative. As part of this initiative, I have decided to sponsor or "adopt," if you will, a Cuban political prisoner named Francisco Chaviano Gonzales, and to advocate on his behalf, and on behalf of the thousands of others being held in Cuba in clear abuses of their basic human rights.

Francisco Chaviano is president of the National Council for Civil Rights, an organization dedicated to promoting democratic practices, racial equality and human rights. He was arrested after government agents broke into his home and confiscated documents revealing human rights abuses in Cuba—specifically, information about the Castro government's sinking of a tugboat that claimed the lives of 41 men, women, and children who were attempting to escape to freedom.

Chaviano was arrested and detained in prison for 1 year, and although a civilian, he was tried by military tribunal and sentenced to 15 years in prison.

He has been confined in isolation and deprived of basic medical care for long periods of time. After being allowed to visit him for the first time in eight years, his wife reported that he is in very poor health. Other members of the civil rights organization have followed in Chaviano's footsteps and continued to press the Cuban government for democratic reforms, at great peril to themselves.

Jimmy Carter is a man who is often praised in the media as a "model ex-President" or a "statesman" for his work with Habitat for Humanity. I do believe there is still time for him to make a more positive contribution to the plight of the Cuban people and to American foreign policy regarding Fidel Castro.

Mr. Carter is scheduled to deliver a speech to the Cuban people tonight. His remarks have the potential to do enormous good or to cause further harm. Rather than legitimizing a tyrant and a man who doesn't care for the well-being of his own people; he could advocate positive change for the beleaguered Cuban people.

If Mr. Carter in his speech tonight is looking for a road map to freedom and prosperity for the Cuban people, he need look no further than the words and principles of freedom written by George Mason in the Virginia Declaration of Rights. This document, adopted on June 12, 1776, helped form the basis of our Declaration of Independence and 15 years later in our Bill of Rights as the first amendments to our Constitution.

I would read a few excerpts from George Mason's historic words from various articles of the Virginia Declaration of Rights, which I think are instructive.

> Article 1: That all men are by nature equally free and independent and have certain inherent rights, of which, when they enter into a state of society, they cannot, by any compact, deprive or divest their posterity; namely, the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring and possessing property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety.
>
> Article 2: That all power is vested in, and consequently derived from, the people; that magistrates are their trustees and servants and at all times amenable to them.
>
> Article 3: That government is, our ought to be, instituted for the common benefit, protection, and security of the people, nation, or community; of all the various modes and forms of government, that is best which is capable of producing the greatest degree of happiness and safety and is most effectually secured against the danger of maladministration. And that, when any government shall be found inadequate or contrary to these purposes, a majority of the community has an indubitable, inalienable, and indefeasible right to reform, alter, or abolish it, in such manner as shall be judged most conductive to the public weal.
>
> Article 12: That the freedom of the press is one of the great bulwalks of liberty, and can never be restrained but by despotic governments.
>
> Article 16: That religion, or the duty which we owe to our Creator, and the manner of discharging it, can be directed only by reason and conviction, not by force or violence; and therefore all men are equally entitled to the free exercise of religion, according to the dictates of conscience . . .

Those are the words of freedom, and of the inherent rights to which all people are entitled, even if only temporarily subjugated.

Therefore, I call on former President Carter to embrace these truths and to use this unique opportunity to advance these enduring principles of liberty in Cuba.

I urge him to support the Varela Project, which is a petition drive that has collected the 10,000 signatures needed under Castro's so-called "constitution" to force a referendum on whether his government should be allowed to continue.

I call on Fidel Castro to heed the concepts first enunciated by George Mason 226 years ago in the Western Hemisphere, and I also call upon him to schedule free and fair democratic elections on the island of Cuba within the next year.

Mr. President, I will close with more words from George Mason, who said:

> There is a passion to the mind of man, especially a free man, which renders him impatient of a restraint."

Mr. Carter has the power to either to fan the flames of those passions and aspirations of the Cuban people, or to throw cold water on them. The choice he needs to make is clear. Do not flinch. Stand strong for freedom!

Thank you. I yield the floor.

LOCAL LAW ENFORCEMENT ACT OF 2001

Mr. SMITH of Oregon. Mr. President, I rise today to speak about hate crimes legislation I introduced with Senator KENNEDY in March of last year. The Local Law Enforcement Act of 2001 would add new categories to current hate crimes legislation sending a signal that violence of any kind is unacceptable in our society.

I would like to describe a terrible crime that occurred April 3, 1991 in Boston, MA. A Northeastern University student was arrested for making anti-Semitic and anti-homosexual death threats. The student, Garrett McAdams, was accused of threatening to kill a Jewish Realtor and bomb the offices of a gay student organization.

I believe that government's first duty is to defend its citizens, to defend them against the harms that come out of hate. The Local Law Enforcement Enhancement Act of 2001 is now a symbol that can become substance. I believe that by passing this legislation and changing current law, we can change hearts and minds as well.

VOTE EXPLANATION

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to explain my absence from yesterday's vote on the nomination of Paul G. Cassell to be U.S. District Judge for the District of Utah. After spending yesterday working with constituents in Connecticut, I was scheduled to fly back to Washington in time to make the vote. Unfortunately, high wind and tornado threats caused flights into Washington to be cancelled. I ultimately returned to Washington by train and too late to cast my vote. Had I been here, I would have cast my vote in the affirmative.

NATIONAL POLICE OFFICERS WEEK

Mrs. CLINTON. Mr. President, each day our Nation's law enforcement officers step onto the street, putting their lives on the line to protect our communities. These honorable men and women risk so much so that others can feel safe.

New Yorkers owe our State and local law enforcement officers an enormous debt of gratitude. The historic drop in crime that we have seen in the last few years is truly a reflection of their fine work and tireless dedication. The low-crime rate that New York City enjoys today would never have been possible without the extraordinary work of the New York City Police Department.

One small step we can take to begin to repay that debt is ensuring that our men and women in blue are equipped with the tools they need to protect themselves from the constant dangers they face; and that police departments around the country have the additional resources they need meet new demands placed on them.

In the past several months, their responsibility have only grown larger. From the first moments our country saw NYPD officers at the base of the World Trade Center towers, the role of police officers around the country was changed forever. The September 11 terrorist attacks put communities around America on the frontlines in our war against terrorism at home, and our local public safety officers must now be prepared for the unimaginable: biological and terrorist attacks.

We pay tribute to the hard work and sacrifice of our police officers not just this week but every day of our lives as we move freely about our communities, largely uninhibited by fear and danger. We should take a moment to recognize the peace of mind that our local law enforcement officers provides us, and life's precious gifts that come with that assurance.

Public service is one of our country's most noble callings and law enforcement captures that spirit of sacrifice and devotion to community. We thank the families of police officers for their ever present courage and selflessness. To the police officers who uphold our laws and protect our communities from crime, we give our appreciation, admiration and immeasurable pride for the jobs you do every day.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

TRIBUTE TO HARRISON WILLIAMS

• Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, last November when our former colleague Harrison Williams passed away, I don't believe his legislative accomplishments were recognized by this body, and I wanted to remember my friend, the enormously popular Senator from New Jersey.

I had the privilege to serve with him for 15 of his 23 years, and he achieved more than most people will ever realize because he worked the old-fashioned way: making headway, not headlines. He sponsored progressive legislation that with 30 or 40 years hindsight, we now see has made an incredible difference in millions of people's lives.

The good mass transit systems we have in our Nation today we have because Pete was mass transit's champion. Americans have the best safety and environmental working conditions in the world because he created the Occupational Safety and Health Administration. We have pension protections because of him. We have greater accessibility for the handicapped because of him. Anything related to worker's rights, or working conditions, he had his hand in.

Like all of us he was not perfect, and he paid a price. But this Senator will remember my friend for his legislative accomplishments, and believes the words he said himself when he left this Chamber: That time, history and Almighty God would vindicate him for the principles for which he fought.

My wife, Patsy, and I know how much his wife, Jeanette, and his four children, miss him, and we hope the best for them.•

MORRISTOWN MEMORIAL HOSPITAL

• Mr. CORZINE. Mr. President, I rise today to congratulate Morristown Memorial Hospital, a member hospital of the Atlantic Health System, for their receipt of the American Hospital Association's NOVA award. This prestigious award recognizes outstanding commitment to improving community-based health care.

The NOVA award honors Morristown's TeenHealthFX.com program, a free interactive Web site, providing teenagers with confidential and anonymous answers for difficult-to-ask health questions. This innovative program has succeeded at breaking down many of the barriers that so often prevent teens from obtaining critical health care information. Created in 1999, through the collaborative efforts of community leaders, teen, and health care professionals, this site has served as a gateway to area health care providers and a source of health care information for more than 100,000 young visitors.

I want to thank Morristown Hospital for supporting such an important and effective program. It is not enough to simply make health information available to our young people. That information needs to be made available in a setting that is comfortable for teenagers to access. This is exactly the environment that TeenHealthFX.com has created in New Jersey. TeenHealthFX.com represents the type of creative thinking and collaboration that our communities must undertake if we are going to improve the health and health habits of teenagers and young adults. Again, congratulations to Morristown Hospital and thank you for your continued commitment to improving health care for all New Jerseyans.•

By Mr. BURNS:

S. 2510. A bill to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to accept the donation of certain lands previously disposed of from the public domain, together with certain mineral rights on federal land, in the Mineral Hill-Crevice Mountain Mining District in the State of Montana, to be returned to the United States for management as part of the national public lands and forests, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

Mr. BURNS. Mr. President, I am pleased to announce the introduction of the Mineral Hill Historic Mining District Preservation Act of 2002. The purpose of this act is for the Forest Service to accept a donation from TVX Mineral Hill, Inc., an inholding of approximately 570 acres of private land in the Gallatin National Forest. This inholding overlooks the northern entrance of Yellowstone National Park and is within well-known elk habitat. The donation also includes 194 acres of mineral rights underlying Federal lands.

This bill provides a win-win situation with benefits for the community, for wildlife, for the company, and for the environment. After a rich and storied history, the Mineral Hill Mine is played out and the opportunity to extract minerals has passed. The property is in very good condition and is being reclaimed in accordance with a reclamation plan approved by the Montana Department of Environmental Quality. The Forest Service has been closely involved during the reclamation planning and implementation processes to make certain that the property will remain in the excellent environmental state it is in today. As an added guarantee, the United States will also be the beneficiary of a $10 million insurance policy provided by TVX to clean up the site in the unlikely event that hazardous materials are discovered in the future.

The Mineral Hill Mine is located in the historic Jardine Mining District which was established during the 1860s. Many of the buildings at the site go back to that time period. Some of the buildings will be preserved for interpretation purposes and will be available to the public. In addition, the site will be used in cooperation with Montana Tech of the University of Montana for mining and geologic education. The Mineral Hill property is being donated by TVX to the Government without the necessity of a payment. There will be ongoing permits issued by the State of Montana and by EPA for monitoring of water discharge. This bill allows for those permits to be upheld and for the water processes to be maintained. In a letter to my office dated June 25, 2001, the Greater Yellowstone Coalition observed that "we believe that there would be no adverse impact to the agency and indeed would be a benefit to the public that this donated land is conveyed with the obligation to maintain the NPDES permit already in force." This is exactly what the bill provides in section 11.

I am pleased to say that this is a bill with the support of all key parties. The Forest Service has agreed to the transfer and management of the land and has been actively involved in this process. The Gardiner Chamber of Commerce supports the project, as do the Commissioners of Park County. The Greater Yellowstone Coalition also supports the donation. Simply put, this legislation is in the public interest. On behalf of the people of Montana, I look forward to its passage.

By Mrs. CARNAHAN (for herself and Mrs. HUTCHISON):

S. 2511. A bill to prevent trafficking in child pornography and obscenity, to proscribe pandering and solicitation relating to visual depictions of minors engaging in sexually explicit conduct, to prevent the use of child pornography and obscenity to facilitate crimes against children, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mrs. CARNAHAN. Mr. President, child pornography is an affront to the inherent decency of our society. Creating and distributing this revolting material causes severe damage to the children involved. Those who purchase this material also harm children by creating a demand for production of more child pornography, leading to a greater number of victimized children.

Congress has enacted strong criminal laws outlawing the production, distribution, and possession of child pornography. But the advent of the internet and advances in imaging technology have made enforcing these laws more difficult. The problem is twofold. First, child pornography can now be created using digital technology such that the subjects of the images are virtual, not real, children. Second, child pornographers facing criminal prosecution now claim that the materials at issue contain computer-generated, virtual image, and claim that such images are constitutionally protected free speech. The technology is now so advanced that it is difficult for expert witnesses to determine whether the pornographers' claims are true, giving real pornographers the ability to escape prosecution.

Congress attempted to address this problem in 1996 by expanding the scope of federal child pornography statutes to cover sexually explicit images that appear to depict children, but were created without using actual children. Unfortunately, last month the Supreme Court determined that parts of the statute were unconstitutional. The Court concluded that the law was drafted too broadly and covered speech that is protected by the First Amendment. Unless Congress takes further action, future prosecutions of child pornographers will be in jeopardy. According to Associate Deputy Attorney General Daniel Collins, if prosecutors can only obtain convictions when the have affirmative proof that actual children were used, the "[g]overnment may be able to prosecute effectively only in very limited cases, such as those in which it happens to be able to match the depictions to pictures in pornographic magazines produced before the development of computer imaging software."

The legislation I am introducing today, along with my colleague Senator HUTCHISON, will cure this problem. It is companion legislation to H.R. 4623 and contains the Justice Department's recommendations on how to draft a constitutional statute that will facilitate prosecution of child pornographers. The legislation strikes a balance between the government's compelling interest in protecting children while not infringing on First Amendment rights.

The bill has a number of features. First, it narrows the definition of virtual child pornography and includes an affirmative defense that places the burden of proof on defendants to establish that the materials at issue were created without using real children. Second, it prohibits all real or virtual child pornography that depicts preteens. These sexually explicit materials involving young children are obscene and, in my view, do not enjoy any first amendment protection. The bill also creates new ways to crack down on pedophiles by outlawing showing pornography to children. It also encourages greater voluntary reporting of suspected child pornography found by internet service providers on their systems.

This legislation is progressing quickly through the House of Representatives. I hope that we can move expeditiously in this body as well to give the Justice Department the tools it needs to continue its campaign against the exploitation and degradation of children.

Mrs. HUTCHISON. Mr. President, I rise today to join my colleague from Missouri to introduce the Child Obscenity and Pornography Prevention Act of 2002. The passage of this legislation is urgently needed to stop the marketing of child pornography and its destructive impact on our society.

This bill is similar to the House version, which has the strong support of the Department of Justice. Attorney General Ashcroft has asked for this legislation so that he will have the tools to prosecute child pornographers. In this Internet age, it is becoming more difficult to ascertain whether child pornography is produced by exploiting real minors or whether it is made with computer imagery. I understand the Supreme Court's concerns about First Amendment rights. The bill we are introducing today does not violate the First Amendment.

Our bill goes after the marketing of child pornography, regardless of whether it is produced using a real minor. Legal precedent is clear that Congress may outlaw the solicitation and attempt to commit a crime, even if the core crime does not transpire. I have been a strong advocate against marketing violence to children, and similarly, I am strongly against the marketing of child pornography. The bottom line is that sexual images of children, even if produced by computer-imagery, only increase the chances of sexual crimes occurring against our children.

In addition, our bill outlaws the production of "obscene" child pornography, regardless of whether a real child or a computer-image is used. The Supreme Court has been clear that obscenity deserves no protection under the first amendment, much less obscenity related to child pornography. Without a new law, the Supreme Court's ruling several weeks ago could mean a pornographer might use the defense that the child pornography does not involve a real minor and thus constitutes protected speech. That is a terrible outcome and we must remedy it.

I am pleased to be cosponsor of this important legislation, and I urge the Senate to address this issue expeditiously.

By Mr. HARKIN (for himself, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. DODD, Mr. HELMS, Mr. KERRY, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. REID, Mr. SMITH of Oregon, and Mr. WELLSTONE):

S. 2512. A bill to provide grants for training court reporters and closed captioners to meet requirements for realtime writers under the Telecommunications Act of 1996, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation, the Training for Realtime Writers Act of 2002, on behalf of myself and my colleagues, Senators GRASSLEY, BINGAMAN, COCHRAN, DODD, HELMS, KERRY, ROCKEFELLER, REID, GORDON SMITH, and WELLSTONE. The 1996 Telecom Act required that all television broadcasts were to be captioned by 2006. This was a much needed reform that is helping millions of deaf and hard-of-hearing Americans to be able to take full advantage of television programming. As of today, it is estimated that 3,000 captioners will be needed to fulfill this requirement, and that number continues to increase as more and more broadband stations come online. Unfortunately, the United States only has 300 captioners. If our country expects to have media fully captioned by 2006, something must be done.

This is an issue that I feel very strongly about because my late brother, Frank, was deaf. I know personally that access to culture, news, and other media was important to him and to others in achieving a better quality of life. More than 28 million Americans, or 8 percent of the population, are considered deaf or hard of hearing and many require captioning services to participate in mainstream activities. In 1990, I authored legislation that required all television sets to be equipped with a computer chip to decode closed captioning. This bill completes the promise of that technology, affording deaf and hard of hearing Americans the same equality and access that captioning provides.

Though we don't necessarily think about it, on the morning of September 11, Holli Miller of Ankeny, Iowa was captioning for Fox News. She was supposed to do her three and a half hour shift ending at 7 a.m. but as we all know, tragedy struck. Despite the fact that she had already worked most of her shift and had two small children to care for, Holli Miller stayed right where she was and for nearly five more hours, she captioned. Without even the ability to take bathroom breaks, Holli Miller made sure that deaf and hard of hearing people got the same news the rest of us got on September 11. I want to say thank you to Holli Miller and all the many captioners and other people across America that made sure the country was alert and informed on that sad day.

But let me emphasize that the deaf and hard of hearing population is only one of a number of groups that will benefit from this legislation. The audience for captioning also includes individuals seeking to acquire or improve literacy skills, including approximately 27 million functionally illiterate adults, 3 or 4 million immigrants learning English as a second language, and 18 million children learning to read in grades kindergarten through 3. In addition, I see people using closed captioning to stay informed everywhere, from the gym to the airport. Captioning helps people educate themselves and helps all of us stay informed and entertained when audio isn't the most appropriate medium.

Although we have a few years to go until the deadline given by the 1996 Telecom Act, our Nation is facing a serious shortage of captioners. Over the past five years, student enrollment in programs that train court reporters to become realtime writers has decreased significantly, causing such programs to close on many campuses. Yet the need for these skills keeps rising. That is why my colleagues and I are introducing this vital piece of legislation. The Training for Realtime Writers Act of 2002 would establish competitive grants to be used toward training real time captioners. This is necessary to ensure that we meet our goal set by the 1996 Telecom Act.

I urge my colleagues to review this legislation and I hope they will join us in support and join us in our effort to win its passage. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2512

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Training for Realtime Writers Act of 2002".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

Congress makes the following findings:

(1) As directed by Congress in section 723 of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 613), as added by section 305 of the Telecommunications Act of 1996 (Public Law 104–104; 110 Stat. 126), the Federal Communications Commission adopted rules requiring closed captioning of most television programming, which gradually require new video programming to be fully captioned beginning in 2006.

(2) More than 28,000,000 Americans, or 8 percent of the population, are considered deaf or hard of hearing and many require captioning services to participate in mainstream activities.

(3) More than 24,000 children are born in the United States each year with some form of hearing loss.

(4) According to the United States Department of Health and Human Services and a study done by the National Council on Aging—

(A) 25 percent of Americans over 65 years old are hearing impaired;

(B) 33 percent of Americans over 70 years old are hearing impaired; and

(C) 41 percent of Americans over 75 years old are hearing impaired.

(5) The National Council on Aging study also found that depression in older adults may be directly related to hearing loss and disconnection with the spoken word.

(6) Over the past 5 years, student enrollment in programs that train court reporters to become realtime writers has decreased significantly, causing such programs to close on many campuses.

SEC. 3. AUTHORIZATION OF GRANT PROGRAM TO PROMOTE TRAINING AND JOB PLACEMENT OF REALTIME WRITERS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The National Telecommunications and Information Administration shall make grants to not more than 20 eligible entities under subsection (b) to promote training and placement of individuals, including individuals who have completed a court reporting training program, as realtime writers in order to meet the requirements for closed captioning of video programming set forth in section 723 of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 613) and the rules prescribed thereunder.

(b) ELIGIBLE ENTITIES.—For purposes of this Act, an eligible entity is a court reporting program that is—

(1) approved by the National Court Reporters Association;

(2) accredited by an accrediting agency recognized by the Department of Education; and

(3) participating in student aid programs under title IV of the Higher Education Act of 1965.

(c) DURATION OF GRANT.—A grant under this section shall be for a period of two years.

(d) MAXIMUM AMOUNT OF GRANT.—The amount of a grant provided under subsection (a) to an entity eligible may not exceed $1,000,000 for the two-year period of the grant under subsection (c).

SEC. 4. APPLICATION.

(a) IN GENERAL.—To receive a grant under section 3, an eligible entity shall submit an application to the National Telecommunications and Information Administration at such time and in such manner as the Administration may require. The application shall contain the information set forth under subsection (b).

(b) INFORMATION.—Information in the application of an eligible entity under subsection (a) for a grant under section 3 shall include the following:

(2) A description of performance measures to be utilized to evaluate the progress of individuals receiving such training and assistance in matters relating to enrollment, completion of training, and job placement and retention.

(3) A description of the manner in which the eligible entity will ensure that recipients of scholarships, if any, funded by the grant will be employed and retained as realtime writers.

(4) A description of the manner in which the eligible entity intends to continue providing the training and assistance to be funded by the grant after the end of the grant period, including any partnerships or arrangements established for that purpose.

(5) A description of how the eligible entity will work with local workforce investment boards to ensure that training and assistance to be funded with the grant will further local workforce goals, including the creation of educational opportunities for individuals who are from economically disadvantaged backgrounds or are displaced workers.

(6) Such other information as the Administration may require.

SEC. 5. USE OF FUNDS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—An eligible entity receiving a grant under section 3 shall use the grant amount for purposes relating to the recruitment, training and assistance, and job placement of individuals, including individuals who have completed a court reporting training program, as realtime writers, including—

(1) recruitment;

(2) subject to subsection (b), the provision of scholarships;

(3) distance learning;

(b) SCHOLARSHIPS.—

(1) AMOUNT.—The amount of a scholarship under subsection (a)(2) shall be based on the amount of need of the recipient of the scholarship for financial assistance, as determined in accordance with part F of title IV of the Higher Education Act of 1965 (20 U.S.C. 1087kk).

(2) AGREEMENT.—Each recipient of a scholarship under subsection (a)(2) shall enter into an agreement with the National Telecommunications and Information Administration to provide realtime writing services for a period of time (as determined by the Administration) that is appropriate (as so determined) for the amount of the scholarship received.

(3) COURSEWORK AND EMPLOYMENT.—The Administration shall establish requirements for coursework and employment for recipients of scholarships under subsection (a)(2), including requirements for repayment of scholarship amounts in the event of failure to meet such requirements for coursework and employment. Requirements for repayment of scholarship amounts shall take into account the effect of economic conditions on the capacity of scholarship recipients to find work as realtime writers.

(c) ADMINISTRATIVE COSTS.—The recipient of a grant under section 3 may not use more than 5 percent of the grant amount to pay administrative costs associated with activities funded by the grant.

(d) SUPPLEMENT NOT SUPPLANT.—Grants amounts under this Act shall supplement and not supplant other Federal or non-Federal funds of the grant recipient for purposes of promoting the training and placement of individuals as realtime writers

SEC. 6. REPORTS.

(a) ANNUAL REPORTS.—Each eligible entity receiving a grant under section 3 shall submit to the National Telecommunications and Information Administration, at the end of each year of the grant period, a report on the activities of such entity with respect to the use of grant amounts during such year.

(b) REPORT INFORMATION.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Each report of an entity for a year under subsection (a) shall include a description of the use of grant amounts by the entity during such year, including an assessment by the entity of the effectiveness of activities carried out using such funds in increasing the number of realtime writers. The assessment shall utilize the performance measures submitted by the entity in the application for the grant under section 4(b).

(2) FINAL REPORT.—The final report of an entity on a grant under subsection (a) shall include a description of the best practices identified by the entity as a result of the grant for increasing the number of individuals who are trained, employed, and retained in employment as realtime writers.

SEC. 7. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

There is authorized to be appropriated to carry out this Act, amounts as follows:

(1) $15,000,000 for each of fiscal years 2003, 2004, and 2005.

(2) Such sums as may be necessary for each of fiscal years 2006 and 2007.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleague from Iowa, Senator HARKIN, in introducing legislation to provide grants for the training of realtime reporters and captioners. Many Senators may not be aware of a looming problem related to a shortage of what are called "realtime writers." Realtime writers are essentially trained court reporters, much like the official reporters of debates here in the Senate, who use a combination of additional specialized training and technology to transform words into text as they are spoken. This can allow deaf and hard of hearing individuals to understand live television as well as follow proceedings at a civic function or in a classroom.

In the Telecommunications Act of 1996, Congress mandated that most television programming be fully captioned by 2006 in order to allow the 28 million Americans who are deaf or hard of hearing to have access to the same news and information that many of us take for granted. I know that most of us were glued to the television on and after September 11 in order to absorb every scrap of information we could about the events that took place. In order for those who are deaf and hard of hearing to receive the same information as it is broadcast on live television, groups of captioners must work around the clock transcribing words as they are spoken.

As of this year, 2002, the required number of hours of captioned programming that must be provided by video-programming distributors increased from 450 to 900. In 2004, this will increase to 1350 hours. By 2006, 100 percent of new nonexempt programming must be provided with captions. At the same time, student enrollment in programs that provide essential training in captioning has decreased significantly, with programs closing on many campuses. In order to meet the growing demand for realtime writers caused by this mandate, we must do everything we can to increase the number of individuals receiving this very specialized training.

The legislation that Senator HARKIN and I are introducing, along with a number of other senators, will help address the shortage of individuals trained as realtime writers by providing grants to up to 20 court reporting programs to promote the training and placement of individuals as realtime writers. Specifically, court reporting programs could use these grants for items like recruitment of students for realtime writing programs, need-based scholarships, distance learning, education and training, job placement assistance, the encouragement of individuals with disabilities to pursue a career as a realtime writer, and personnel costs.

The expansion of distance learning opportunities in particular will have an enormous impact by making training accessible to individuals who want to become realtime writers but do not live in metropolitan areas. Also, need based scholarships offered using these grant funds would be subject to an agreement with the National Telecommunications and Information Administration to provide realtime writing services for a period of time.

Unless we act now, the shortage of individuals trained as realtime writers will only grow more severe. This would leave the 28 million deaf or hard of hearing Americans without the ability to fully participate in many of the professional, educational, and civic activities that other Americans enjoy. I would therefore urge my fellow Senators to support the swift passage of this legislation.

By Mr. BIDEN (for himself and Mrs. CLINTON)

S. 2513. A bill to assess the extent of the backlog in DNA analysis of rape kit samples, and to improve investigation and prosecution of sexual assault cases with DNA evidence; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the DNA Sexual Assault Justice Act of 2002, a bill that guarantees prompt justice to victims of sexual assault crimes through DNA technology. 99.9 percent, that is how accurate DNA evidence is. 1 in 30 billion, those are the odds someone else committed a crime if a suspect's DNA matches evidence at the crime scene. 20 or 30 years, that is how long DNA evidence from a crime scene lasts.

Just 10 years ago DNA analysis of evidence could have cost thousands of dollars and taken months, now testing one sample costs $40 and can take days. Ten years ago forensic scientists needed blood the size of a bottle cap, now DNA testing can be done on a sample the size of a pinhead. The changes in DNA technology are remarkable, and mark a sea change in how we can fight crime, particularly sexual assault crimes. The FBI tells us that since 1998 the national DNA database has helped put away violent criminals in 4,179 investigations in 32 States. How? By matching the DNA crime evidence to the DNA profiles of offenders. Individual success stories of DNA "cold hits" in sexual assault cases makes these numbers all too real.

For instance, in Florida, Kellie Green was brutally attached and raped in the laundry room of her apartment complex. Because of lack of funds, her rape kit sat on the shelf for three years until a persistent detective had it analyzed. The evidence matched the profile of a man already incarcerated for beating and raping a women 6 weeks before Kellie. Or take for example a 1996 case in St. Louis where two young girls were abducted from bus stops and raped at opposite ends of the city. The police were unable to identify a suspect. In 1999, the police decided to rerun the DNA testing to develop new leads. In January 2000, the DNA database matched the 1996 case to a 1999 rape case, and police where able to identify the perpetrator.

Just days ago, the New York Police Department arrested a man linked to the rape of a woman four years ago. In 1997, a woman was horribly beaten, robbed and raped, there were no suspects. Several months ago,the perpetrator submitted a DNA sample as a condition of probation after serving time for burglary. That DNA sample matched the DNA from the 1997 rape. Crime solved, streets safer.

Undoubtedly, DNA matching by comparing evidence gathered at the crime scene with offender samples entered on the national DNA database has proven to be the deciding factor in solving stranger sexual assault cases, it has revolutionized the criminal justice system, and brought closure and justice for victims.

In light of the past successes and the future potential of DNA evidence, the reports about the backlog of untested rape kits and other crime scene waiting in police warehouses are simply shocking.

Today I am introducing legislation, "The DNA Sexual Assault Justice Act of 2002", to strengthen the existing Federal DNA regime as an effective crime fighting tool. My bill addresses five, pressing issues.

First, exactly how bad is the backlog of untested rape kits nationwide? A 1999 government report found over 180,000 rape kits were sitting, untested, on the storage shelves of police department and laboratories all across the country. While recent press reports estimate that the number today is approaching 500,000 untested rape kits, I am told that there is no current, accurate numbers of the backlog. Behind every single one of those rape kits is a victim who deserves recognition and justice. Accordingly, my legislation would require the Attorney General to survey every single law enforcement agency in the country to assess the extent of the backlog of rape kits waiting to undergo DNA testing. To combat the problem of rape kit backlogs, it is imperative to know the real numbers, and how best to utilize federal resources.

Second, how can existing Federal law be strengthened to make sure that State crime labs have the funds for the critical DNA analysis needed to solve sex assault cases? To fight crime most effectively, we must both test rape kits and enter convicted offender DNA samples into the DNA database. There has been explosive growth in the use of forensic sciences by law enforcement. A government survey found that in 2000 alone, crime labs received 31,000 cases, a 47 percent increase from almost 21,000 cases in 1999. In addition, the labs received 177,000 convicted offender DNA samples, an almost 77 percent increase from 100,242 samples in 1999.

All across the country, laboratories report personnel shortages in the face of this overwhelming work. According to this same government survey, on average, there are 6 employees in a State crime lab—a lab that must not only do test DNA for hundreds of cases, but also run forensic tests on blood, footprints or ballistic evidence. The bill I'm introducing would: (1) Increase current funding levels to both test rape kits and to process and upload offender samples; and (2) allow local governments to apply directly to the Justice Department for these grants. I thank my colleagues, Senators KOHL and DEWINE, who began this effort with the DNA Backlog Elimination At of 2000.

Third, what assistance does the FBI need to keep up with the crushing number of DNA samples which need to be tested or stored in the national database? I am told that the current national DNA database, known as the Combined DNA Index, or "CODIS", is nearing capacity of convicted offender DNA samples. My bill would provide funds to the FBI to 1. Upgrade the national DNA computer database to handle the huge projections of samples; and 2. process and upload Federal convicted offender DNA samples into the database. Efforts to include more Federal and State convicted offenders in our database just makes plain sense to fight crime. We know that sexual assault is a crime with one of the highest rates of recidivism, and that many sexual assault crimes are committed by those with past convictions for other kinds of crime. Their DNA samples from prior convictions help law enforcement efforts enormously.

Fourth, what additional tools are needed to help treat victims of sexual assault? One group that understands the importance of gathering credible DNA evidence are forensic sexual assault nurse examiners, who are sensitive to the trauma of this horrible crime and make sure that patients are not revictimized in the aftermath. These programs should be in each and every emergency room and play an integral role in police departments, bridging the gap between the law and the medicine.

Likewise, tapping the power of DNA requires well-trained law enforcement who know how to collect and preserve DNA evidence from the crime scene. Training should be a matter of course for all law enforcement. No rape kit evidence will lead to the perpetrator if the DNA evidence is collected improperly. The DNA Sexual Assault Justice Act would create a new grant program to carry out sexual assault examiner programs and training. And it would train law enforcement personnel in the handling of sexual assault cases, including drug-facilitated assaults, and the collection and use of DNA samples for use as forensic evidence.

Fifth, what can be done to ensure that sexual assault offenders who cannot be identified by their victim are nevertheless brought to justice? Profound injustice is done to rape victims when delayed DNA testing leads to a "cold hit" after the statute of limitations has expired. For example, Jeri Elster was brutally raped in her California home, and for years the police were unable to solve the crime. Seven years later, DNA from the rape matched a man in jail for an unrelated crime. Yet the rapist was never charged, convicted, or sentenced because California's statute of limitations had expired the previous year.

The DNA Sexual Assault Justice Act of 2000 would change current law to authorize Federal "John Doe/DNA indictments" that will permit Federal prosecutors to issue an indictment identifying an unknown defendant by his DNA profile within the 5-year statute of limitations. Once outstanding, the DNA indictment would permit prosecution at anytime once there was a DNA "cold hit" through the national DNA database system.

John De/DNA indictments strike the right balance between encouraging swift and efficient investigations, recognizing the durability and credibility of DNA evidence and preventing an injustice if a cold hit happens years after the crime. The law must catch up with the technology. I started looking at this issue almost two decades ago when I began drafting the Violence Against Women Act. In fact, it is the Violence Against Women Act that provided the first funding to sexual assault nurse examiner programs. The DNA Sexual Justice Act of 2000 is the next step, a way to connect the dots between the extraordinary strides in DNA technology and my commitment to ending violence against women. We must ensure that justice delayed is not justice denied.

By Mr. WELLSTONE (for himself, Mrs. LINCOLN, Mr. DAYTON, Mr. KENNEDY, Mrs. CLINTON, Mrs. FEINSTEIN, and Mrs. BOXER):

S.J. Res. 37. A joint resolution providing for congressional disapproval under chapter 8 of title 5, United States Code, of the rule submitted by Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services within the Department of Health and Human Services relating to modification of the medicaid upper payment limit for non-State government owned or operated hospitals published in the Federal Register on January 18, 2002, and submitted to the Senate on March 15, 2002; to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WELLSTONE. Mr. President, I rise today to submit a Resolution of Disapproval to reverse a rule submitted by the Center for Medicare and Medicaid Services, CMS. The rule, which takes effect today, lowers the Medicaid Upper Payment Limit for non-State government owned or operated hospitals. It reduces the Federal Medicaid match, or Medicaid Upper Payment Limit, from 150 percent of the Medicare rate to 100 percent. According to the administration's budget, the rule will cut $9 billion over 5 years, money currently targeted to public hospitals and other "safety net" health programs, the most vulnerable sector of our health care system. At a time when Medicaid programs in the States are struggling, we simply can't afford to take this amount from our health care safety net. Too many people will be hurt.

The regulation will mean a loss of about $30 million for Minnesota's public health care system this year, potentially more in future years. Hennepin County Medical Center alone stands to lose about $10 million this year. This is a hospital that provides essential health care for thousands of Minnesotans. For many, it is the only place they can go. Other hospitals and clinics around Minnesota will also be deprived of needed funding. At a time when our health care system, and particularly our public hospitals are struggling just to survive, we ought not to be taking resources away from them like this.

CMS Director Scully has attempted to justify this damaging reduction by pointing to instances in the past when States did not use the program's money for health care purposes. Director Scully is certainly correct. The program should be used for health care, not for anything else. But slashing the Upper Payment Limit means that none of this money goes to health care. That doesn't make any sense. The loopholes that existed in the program have already been closed. The rule is a $9 billion transfer away from those who desperately need health care, purportedly in order to solve a problem, but the problem has already been fixed. The rule is not needed and will cause great harm. I urge colleagues to support this resolution of disapproval.

STATEMENTS ON SUBMITTED RESOLUTIONS

SENATE RESOLUTION 267—EXPRESSING THE SENSE OF THE SENATE REGARDING THE POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES AT THE 54TH ANNUAL MEETING OF THE INTERNATIONAL WHALING COMMISSION

Mr. KERRY (for himself, Ms. SNOWE, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. MCCAIN, Mr. LIEBERMAN, Mr. WYDEN, Mr. AKAKA, Mr. REED, Mr. TORRICELLI, Mr. FITZGERALD, Ms. COLLINS, Mr. LUGAR, Mrs. BOXER, and Mr. KENNEDY) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. RES. 267

Whereas whales have very low reproductive rates, making whale populations extremely vulnerable to pressure from commercial whaling;

Whereas whales migrate throughout the world's oceans and international cooperation is required to successfully conserve and protect whale stocks;

Whereas in 1946 the nations of the world adopted the International Convention for the Regulation of Whaling, which established the International Whaling Commission to provide for the proper conservation of whale stocks;

Whereas the Commission adopted a moratorium on commercial whaling in 1982 in order to conserve and promote the recovery of whale stocks;

Whereas the Commission has designated the Indian Ocean and the ocean waters around Antarctica as whale sanctuaries to further enhance the recovery of whale stocks;

Whereas many nations of the world have designated waters under their jurisdiction as whale sanctuaries where commercial whaling is prohibited, and additional regional whale sanctuaries have been proposed by nations that are members of the Commission;

Whereas two member nations currently have reservations to the Commission's moratorium on commercial whaling and 1 member nation is currently conducting commercial whaling operations in spite of the moratorium and the protests of other nations;

Whereas a nonmember nation that opposes the moratorium against commercial whaling is seeking to joint the Convention, on the condition that it be exempt from the moratorium;

Whereas the Commission has adopted several resolutions at recent meetings asking member nations to halt commercial whaling activities conducted under reservation to the moratorium and to refrain from issuing special permits for research involving the killing of whales and other cetaceans;

Whereas 1 member nation of the Commission has taken a reservation to the Commission's Southern Ocean Sanctuary and also continues to conduct unnecessary lethal Scientific whaling in the Southern Ocean and in the North Pacific Ocean;

Whereas the Commission's Scientific Committee has repeatedly expressed serious concerns about the scientific need for such lethal research;

Whereas one member nation in the past unsuccessfully sought an exemption allowing commercial whaling of up to 50 minke whales, in order to provide economic assistance to specific vessels, now seeks a scientific permit for these same vessels to take 50 minke whales;

Whereas the lethal take of whales under scientific permits has increased both in quantity and species, with species now including minke, Bryde's, and sperm whales, and new proposals have been offered to include sei whales for the first time;

Whereas there continue to be indications that whale meat is being traded on the international market despite a ban on such trade under the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species, and that meat may be originating in one of the member nations of the Commission; and

Whereas engaging in commercial whaling under reservation and lethal scientific whaling undermines the conservation program of the Commission. Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that—

(1) at the 54th Annual Meeting of the International Whaling Commission the United States should—

(A) remain firmly opposed to commercial whaling;

(B) initiate and support efforts to ensure that all activities conducted under reservations to the Commission's moratorium or sanctuaries are ceased;

(C) oppose the proposal to allow a nonmember country to join the convention with a reservation that exempts it from the moratorium against commercial whaling:

(D) oppose the lethal taking of whales for scientific purposes unless such lethal taking is specifically authorized by the Scientific Committee of the Commission;

(E) seek the Commission's support for specific efforts by member nations to end illegal trade in whale meat; and

(F) support the permanent protection of whale populations through the establishment of whale sanctuaries in which commercial whaling is prohibited;

(2) at the 12th Conference of the Parties to the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species, the United States should oppose all efforts to reopen international trade in whale meat or downlist any whale population;

(3) the United States should make full use of all appropriate diplomatic mechanisms, relevant international laws and agreements, and other appropriate mechanisms to implement the goals set forth in paragraphs (1) and (2); and

(4) if the Secretary of Commerce certifies to the President, under section 8(a)(2) of the Fishermen's Protective Act of 1967 (22 U.S.C. 1978(a)(2)), that nationals of a foreign country are engaging in trade or a taking which diminishes the effectiveness of the Convention, then the United States should take appropriate steps at its disposal pursuant to Federal law to convince such foreign country to cease such trade or taking.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, as Chairman of the Oceans, Atmosphere and Fisheries Subcommittee, I rise today to submit a resolution regarding the policy of the United States at the upcoming 54th Annual Meeting of the International Whaling Commission, IWC. I wish to thank the Ranking Member of the Subcommittee, Ms. SNOWE, for co-sponsoring this resolution. I wish to also thank my colleagues Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. MCCAIN, Mr. WYDEN, Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. LIEBERMAN, Mr. AKAKA, Mr. REED, Mr.

TORRICELLI, Ms. COLLINS, Mr. LUGAR, Mrs. BOXER and Mr. KENNEDY for cosponsoring as well.

The IWC will meet in Japan from May 20 to 24, 2002. Despite an IWC moratorium on commercial whaling since 1985, Japan and Norway have harvested over 1000 minke whales since the moratorium was put in place. Whales are already under enormous pressure worldwide from collisions with ships, entanglement in fishing gear, coastal pollution, noise emanating from surface vessels and other sources. The need to conserve and protect these magnificent mammals is clear.

The IWC was formed in 1946 under the International Convention for the Regulation of Whaling, Convention, in recognition of the fact that whales are highly migratory and that they do not belong to any one Nation. In 1982, the IWC agreed on an indefinite moratorium on all commercial whaling beginning in 1985. Unfortunately, Japan has been using a loophole that allows countries to issue themselves special permits for whaling under scientific purposes. The IWC Scientific Committee has not requested any of the information obtained by killing these whales and has stated that Japan's scientific whaling data is not required for management. At this meeting, Japan intends to propose to add an additional 100 whales to the whales it kills for scientific purposes. Japan's claim that it needs these whales for scientific purposes is ever more tenuous: last year, Japan unsuccessfully sought to obtain an exemption allowing 50 whales to be commercially hunted to provide economic assistance to specific vessels. This year, Japan is seeking to use these same vessels to kill the same number of whales, in the name of "science." The additional 50 whales include new species, sei whales. Norway, on the other hand, objects to the moratorium on whaling and openly pursues a commercial fishery for whales. Iceland, currently a nonparty, is proposing to join the Convention, but only if it is granted a reservation that exempts it from the ban on commercial whaling.

This resolution calls for the U.S. delegation to the IWC to remain firmly opposed to commercial whaling. In addition, this resolution calls for the U.S. to oppose the lethal taking of whales for scientific purposes unless such lethal taking is specifically authorized by the Scientific Committee of the Commission. The resolution calls for the U.S. to oppose the proposal to allow a non-member country to join the Convention with a reservation that would allow it to commercially whale. The resolution calls for the U.S. delegation to support an end to the illegal trade of whale meat and to support the permanent protection of whale populations through the establishment of whale sanctuaries in which commercial whaling is prohibited.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. President, the resolution that Senator KERRY and I are submitting is very timely and important. As we work here in the Senate today, representatives of nations from around the globe are preparing for the 54th annual Meeting of the International Whaling Commission to be held in Japan, May 20–24, 2002. At this meeting, the IWC will determine the fate of the world's whales through consideration of proposals to end the current global moratorium on commercial whaling. The adoption of any such proposals by the IWC would mark a major setback in whale conservation. It is imperative that the United States remain firm in its opposition to any proposals to resume commercial whaling and that we, as a Nation, continue to speak out passionately against this practice.

It is also time to close one of the loopholes used by nations to continue to whale without regard to the moratorium or established whale sanctuaries. The practice of unnecessary lethal scientific whaling is outdated and the value of the data of such research has been called into question by an international array of scientists who study the same population dynamics questions as those who harvest whales in the name of science. This same whale meat is then processed and sold in the marketplace. These sentiments have been echoed by the Scientific Committee of the IWC which has repeatedly passed resolutions calling for the cessation of lethal scientific whaling, particularly that occurring in designated whale sanctuaries. They have offered to work with all interested parties to design research protocols that will not require scientists to harm or kill whales.

Last year, Japan expanded their scientific whaling program over the IWC's objections. The resolution that we are offering expresses the Sense of the Senate that the United States should continue to remain firmly opposed to any resumption of commercial whaling and oppose, at the upcoming IWC meeting, the non-necessary lethal taking of whales for scientific purposes.

Commercial whaling has been prohibited for many species for more than sixty years. In 1982, the continued decline of commercially targeted stocks led the IWC to declare a global moratorium on all commercial whaling which went into effect in 1986. The United States was a leader in the effort to establish the moratorium, and since then we have consistently provided a strong voice against commercial whaling and have worked to uphold the moratorium. This resolution reaffirms the United States' strong support for a ban on commercial whaling at a time when our negotiations at the IWC most need that support. Norway, Japan, and other countries have made it clear that they intend to push for the elimination of the moratorium, and for a return to the days when whales were treated as commodities.

The resolution would reiterate the U.S. objection to activities being conducted under reservations to the IWC's moratorium. The resolution would also oppose the proposal to allow a non-member country to join the Convention with a reservation that would allow it to commercially whale. The resolution would also oppose all efforts made at the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species, CITES, to reopen international trade in whale meat or to downlist any whale population. In addition, the IWC, as well as individual nations including the United States, has established whale sanctuaries that would prevent whaling in specified areas even if the moratorium were to be lifted. Despite these efforts to give whale stocks a chance to rebuild, the number of whales harvested has increased in recent years, tripling since the implementation of the global moratorium in 1986. This is a dangerous trend that does not show signs of stopping.

Domestically, we work very hard to protect whales in U.S. waters, particularly those considered threatened or endangered. One own laws and regulations are designed to give whales one of the highest standards of protection in the world, and as a result, our own citizens are subject to rules designed to protect against even the accidental taking of whales. Commercial whaling is, of course, strictly prohibited. Given what is asked of our citizens to protect against even accidental injury to whales here in the United States, it would be grossly unfair if we retreated in any way from our position opposing commercial, intentional whaling by other countries. Whales migrate throughout the world's oceans, and as we protect whales in our own waters, so should we act to protect them internationally.

Whales are among the most intelligent animals on Earth, and they play an important role in the marine ecosystem. Yet, there is still much about them that we do not know. Resuming the intentional harvest of whales is irresponsible, and it could have ecological consequences that we cannot predict. Therefore, it is premature to even consider easing conservation measures.

The right policy is to protect whales across the globe, and to oppose the resumption of commercial whaling. I urge my colleagues to support swift passage of this resolution.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, I rise today to voice my strong support for the resolution expressing the sense of the Senate regarding the policy of the United states at the 54th Annual Meeting of the International Whaling Commission. This resolution affirms and renews our long-standing commitment to end the practice of commercial whale-hunting, as well as the killing of whales for profit under the false rubric of "scientific whaling." It constitutes a powerful statement to the rest of the world that we have not, and will not, grow complacent in fighting to preserve the existence of these remarkable beings.

Our present action draws urgency from the fact that the single most important safety net for ensuring the survival of whale species is under threat of unraveling. When the International Whaling Commission, IWC, voted to establish a global moratorium on commercial whaling in 1982, the decision represented a profound acknowledgement on the part of the international community of its abysmal and repeated failure to manage whale stocks in a responsible manner. Such was the egregiousness of our collective whaling legacy that nothing short of a complete ban on commercial whaling was determined to stave these creatures away from the path to extinction.

Sadly, the thirty years since the enactment of the moratorium have only served to vindicate the wisdom of the IWC's landmark decision. One needs only look to the history of duplicitous efforts undertaken to skirt the strictures of the moratorium to see this. Most blatant among these efforts has been the practice by certain countries to exploit the exemption for scientific whaling in order to hunt whales for ostensibly scientific, but essentially commercial, purposes. This disingenuous behavior directly contradicts the purpose and spirit, if not the letter, of the moratorium. Regrettably, the lack of regard shown by these nations for obligations that were assumed freely and voluntarily does not inspire one with faith that they would act any more responsibly should the door to commercial whaling ever be opened.

Less apparent, but no less discouraging, is the unwillingness by some nations to vigorously monitor and prosecute the illegal trading of whale meat. Whether the absence of rigorous policing measures is the result of conscious intent or uninformed negligence, the outcome is the same. Unscrupulous operators are provided with incentives to disregard the law and afforded with the knowledge that they may do so with impunity. The lax enforcement of existing laws calls into further doubt the international community's prospective will and capacity to enforce quotas on catches if commercial whaling were resumed.

In light of the evidence refuting the notion that a uniform commitment to act responsibly and in accordance with international mandates currently exits or would crystallize in the foreseeable future, it would be a grave and reckless mistake for the moratorium to be lifted now. This is why we must endeavor to shore up support for the moratorium prior to the IWC's 54th Annual Meeting, and to prevent the entry of any nation that seeks to have a voting voice in the IWC without agreeing to abide by the decisions of that same body.

I note with particular concern Iceland's pending application to rejoin the IWC with a reservation that would leave it with complete discretion in choosing whether or not to engage in commercial whaling. It is well-established that Iceland's motivation in rejoining is to expand the voting block for revoking the moratorium. In applying with the reservation, however, Iceland aims to have all the privileges of membership free and clear of any concomitant burdens and responsibilities. But no nation should be allowed to have its cake and eat it too. It would be fundamentally unfair to the other IWC members to give Iceland a role in defining the limits of their behavior when Iceland itself would not have to play by the same rules. More importantly, Iceland's admission would establish a dangerous precedent whereby other nations would be encouraged to circumvent international treaties by withdrawing from them and then rejoining with specific reservations against onerous obligations.

In view of our concerns over the deleterious consequences of Iceland's reentry, nineteen of my Senate colleagues and I previously sent a bipartisan letter to Secretary of State Colin Powell urging him to assume a leadership role in opposing Iceland's application. The time is ripe, however, for us to make a more public and formal declaration of our position, and to provide our Administration with the encouragement and support it needs to take bold action at the next IWC meeting and the next conference of the Parties to the Convention on International Trade in endangered Species. I ask you to joint in registering our strong opinion on this important and worthwhile cause.

SENATE RESOLUTION 268—DESIGNATING MAY 20, 2002, AS A DAY FOR AMERICANS TO RECOGNIZE THE IMPORTANCE OF TEACHING CHILDREN ABOUT CURRENT EVENTS IN AN ACCESSIBLE WAY TO THEIR DEVELOPMENT AS BOTH STUDENTS AND CITIZENS

Mr. DODD (for himself and Mr. LIEBERMAN) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. RES. 268

Whereas, since its founding in 1902, the Weekly Reader has reported current events in a manner that is accessible to children, thereby helping millions of children learn to read, which is an indispensable foundation for success in school and in life;

Whereas the Weekly Reader's accessible style has helped children understand many of the important events that have shaped the world during the past 100 years, including World War I, the Great Depression, World War II, the Civil Rights movement, Vietnam, the first Moon landing, the collapse of the Soviet Union, and the tragic events of September 11, 2001;

Whereas a citizenry well informed about national and international current events is critical to a strong democracy;

Whereas the Weekly Reader is read by nearly 11,000,000 children each week in every State, and in more than 90 percent of the school districts in the United States; and

Whereas on May 20, 2002, children around the country will join the Weekly Reader in celebrating its 100th birthday: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate—

(1) designates May 20, 2002, as a day for Americans to recognize the importance of teaching children about current events in an accessible way to their development as both students and citizens; and

(2) requests that the President issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe that day with appropriate activities.

SENATE RESOLUTION 269—EXPRESSING SUPPORT FOR LEGISLATION TO STRENGTHEN AND IMPROVE MEDICARE IN ORDER TO ENSURE COMPREHENSIVE BENEFITS FOR CURRENT AND FUTURE RETIREES, INCLUDING ACCESS TO A MEDICARE PRESCRIPTION DRUG BENEFIT

Mr. CRAIG (for himself, Mr. COCHRAN, and Mr. INHOFE) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

S. RES. 269

Whereas our nation's senior citizens and the disabled need and deserve the highest quality health care available;

Whereas the Medicare program has not fundamentally changed since its creation over 35 years ago and has not kept pace with recent improvements in health care delivery;

Whereas the Medicare Trustees report that the current system is not sustainable;

Whereas Medicare only provides limited access to many lifesaving and health enhancing pharmaceutical and biological medicines;

Whereas America's seniors need a comprehensive, voluntary outpatient prescription drug program under Medicare; and

Whereas Medicare prescription drug coverage can best be provided through comprehensive steps to modernize and strengthen the Medicare program: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that—

(1) by September 30, 2002, the Senate should consider legislation to comprehensively modernize the Medicare program under which beneficiaries will be offered more choices, including outpatient prescription drug coverage;

(2) this legislation should ensure that the Medicare program's financial solvency is preserved and protected;

(3) this legislation should permit beneficiaries to choose from a variety of coverage options, including an option to continue benefits under the current plan as well as an option to choose from benefits offered by multiple competing, private insurance plans that rely on competition to control costs and improve quality; and

(4) this legislation should provide at least one option providing comprehensive outpatient prescription drug coverage to Medicare beneficiaries, including those having high prescription drug costs.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, I rise today to submit a Sense of the Senate Resolution expressing support for Medicare Reform and the addition of a prescription drug benefit. I am pleased that Senator THAD COCHRAN and Senator JAMES INHOFE are joining with me in this effort today.

The Medicare program is of vital importance to our Nation's seniors and has been providing them dependable, affordable and high quality health care for over 35 years. Despite this, I think we would all agree that the system has not kept pace with modern medicine or coverage available to those covered by private insurance. The practice of medicine has changed dramatically since the inception of the Medicare program. The many new technologies and drugs that are available to our seniors today weren't even an option 35 years ago.

No senior should have to worry about whether he or she can afford the medicine they need to stay healthy. I am well aware that the rising cost of prescription medicine and prescription drug coverage is a great concern for today's seniors and tomorrow's retires. Indeed, in some cases, prescription drugs are as important as a doctor's care. It is this reality that makes it so critical we focus our efforts on finding a solution.

As discussion continues, it is crucial we develop effective options for simultaneously modernizing and securing Medicare. We can not afford to add an expensive new comprehensive benefit without real reform to the program and we need to focus our attention on the necessary steps to ensure Medicare remains dependable and up to date.

This is why I am choosing to submit this Sense of the Senate Resolution expressing support for a prescription drug benefit and Medicare modernization. I am calling on the Senate to work to pass legislation on this issue before September 30, 2002 and to give current and future seniors the benefits they deserve. Included in this resolution are principles that I believe should be included in any Medicare or prescription drug legislation that passes this year. I hope my colleagues will join me in supporting these principles and working towards the goal of passing substantial Medicare reform.

PROGRAM

Mr. REID. Mr. President, we worked hard today. There were some good debates. There are Senators who have a lot of amendments they say they want to offer, and we need to move on those as quickly as we can. We ask Senators to be aware of what is going on in the Chamber and to be ready at any given time to come and offer their amendments. The majority leader has indicated he wants this debate to proceed on this bill in the form of amendments being offered, but I think there will come a time when we are going to have to move on. I do not know if that means he would have to file a motion to invoke cloture, but I would assume so. So I hope Senators will realize they have a finite amount of time to offer amendments and we should move forward on these as quickly as possible because for people who wait for a day that may be more convenient to them, that day may be too late.

RECESS UNTIL 9:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. REID. Mr. President, if there is no further business to come before the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess under the previous order.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Tuesday, May 14, 2002

The House met at 12:30 p.m. and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. BOOZMAN).

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Speaker:

Washington, DC, May 14, 2002.

I hereby appoint the Honorable JOHN BOOZMAN to act as Speaker pro tempore on this day.

J. DENNIS HASTERT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

MORNING HOUR DEBATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the order of the House of January 23, 2002, the Chair will now recognize Members from lists submitted by the majority and minority leaders for morning hour debates. The Chair will alternate recognition between the parties, with each party limited to not to exceed 30 minutes, and each Member, except the majority leader, the minority leader, or the minority whip, limited to not to exceed 5 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Mexico (Mr. UDALL) for 5 minutes.

STATES NEED FLEXIBILITY IN WELFARE REFORM

Mr. UDALL of New Mexico. Mr. Speaker, we have passed welfare reform out of this body; and as a result, we are putting more people to work. Welfare rolls have been cut in half in many States. With these successes in mind, now is the time to look at what is working and what is not.

One of the biggest problems is how reform is impacting the rural areas of America. In rural America, where there are not many job opportunities, we are telling people to leave their homes and move to the city. In rural New Mexico, many people have been tied to the land and their homes for generations. Forcing people to move is not good public policy, and it is undermining the vitality of rural America. The solution is flexibility for States to design their programs, and the solution is transportation. Transportation should be a key part of any welfare reform.

Another issue relates to the jobs people are filling. Is this the kind of employment where an individual can move up the economic ladder and support a family? Many times these are minimum-wage jobs with no real future. So we must provide meaningful job training so that an individual not only gets a job, but that that job opens the doors to better future opportunities.

Welfare recipients want to work, but they also want to take care of their children. This is the common dilemma faced by welfare parents, many of whom are single mothers with children. The last thing we should do in the name of reform is send parents to work and leave the children without adequate nurturing and care. That is why child care is a critical component of a successful welfare reform effort.

If we have learned anything in this reform effort, it is that States should have the flexibility to meet the goals of putting people to work in good jobs, while children get good quality daycare. Inner cities and rural areas face enormous challenges because frequently jobs do not exist nearby. With flexibility, States have been able to achieve big strides. Without flexibility, States will fail in these important tasks.

Unfortunately, the administration bill that the House is going to consider this week fails to recognize why we have made progress. It undercuts the flexibility of the States. It provides for rigid Federal mandates which are good political talking points, but bad public policy. The Bush administration also fails to recognize we are in different times. In 1995 the economy was expanding. We had unprecedented job growth. Now we have high unemployment, and it is sluggish growth. It is essential that the States receive adequate resources to do the job.

The administration shortchanges these reforms at a time when State budgets are in deficit. The administration bill imposes massive new mandates and additional costs on States that cannot be met. The Congressional Budget Office has estimated the new work requirements in the bill will cost the States up to $11 billion over 5 years. Yet this bill contains no new funding.

Governors, State legislators, mayors, welfare directors and poverty experts have all indicated that these mandates cannot be met. Forty-seven out of 47 States surveyed by the National Governor's Association indicated that the bill requires fundamental changes in their welfare programs. Why would an administration which supports States rights craft a bill with so many Federal mandates and so little State flexibility?

Just a word on how we deal with these bills. I would urge the Republican leadership to have a full and open debate on the issue of welfare reform and temporary assistance to needy families. Too many times in recent days we have taken up bills where no amendments are allowed by the minority. Many times no opposition bill is even allowed on the floor, or a motion to recommit. That is not a democratic process. It does not serve this body well. It does not serve the country well.

Mr. Speaker, I would urge the Republican leadership to bring this bill before this body under an open rule, allow full debate, and allow the House to work its will.

MARRIAGE TAX PENALTY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the order of the House of January 23, 2002, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. WELLER) is recognized during morning hour debates for 5 minutes.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Speaker, this week we have an important piece of legislation which is coming to the floor, a product of the Committee on Ways and Means, legislation which is entitled H.R. 4626, Encouraging Work and Supporting Marriage Act of 2002. Essentially this legislation does two things: it expands and reforms the work opportunity tax credit, a hiring incentive to give those on welfare an opportunity to go to work.

Yesterday, I stood with President Bush in Chicago at the United Parcel Service facility where he highlighted this very program which has provided opportunities for thousands and thousands of Chicago residents to go from welfare to work; and clearly the Work Opportunity Tax Credit, which was a creation of Ronald Reagan, is one of those provisions which is working as we see our Nation's welfare rolls cut in half and 9 million Americans move from welfare to work.

The other key part of the Encouraging Work and Supporting Marriage Act of 2002 is legislation which much more quickly phases in the marriage tax relief provisions which are part of what we nicknamed the Bush tax cut signed into law last year.

Over the last several years, I have had the opportunity to come to this floor and talk about the unfairness of our complicated Tax Code and how our current Tax Code historically has punished marriage, a very basic institution in our society. In fact, I believe the most important institution in our society is marriage. Unfortunately, up until President Bush's signature signing the Bush tax cut into law, our Tax Code punished marriage.

☐This symbol represents the time of day during the House proceedings, e.g., ☐ 1407 is 2:07 p.m.

Matter set in this typeface indicates words inserted or appended, rather than spoken, by a Member of the House on the floor.

Let me give an example of what the marriage tax penalty is and was. Under our Tax Code prior to the Bush tax cut, 43 million married working couples paid on average $1,700 more in higher taxes just because they were married. I do not believe that is right; I do not believe that is fair. And I am proud to say that House Republicans made it a priority to work with the President to eliminate the marriage tax penalty.

I would also note what creates the marriage tax penalty is married couples file their taxes jointly. A single person files single and married couples file jointly, which means there is a combined income. If there are two incomes, that pushes the couple into a higher tax bracket and in most cases creates the marriage tax penalty.

I have a couple here from my district I would like to introduce, Jose and Magdalena Castillo from Joliet, Illinois. They are both in the workforce. They have a son, Eduardo, as well as a daughter, Carolina. They paid about $1,200 in higher taxes just because they are married prior to the Bush tax cut.

I think it is wrong. Thanks to the Bush tax cut, Jose and Magdalena Castillo of Joliet, Illinois, saw their marriage tax penalty eliminated. Of course, we are going to have legislation this week which is going to help low- and moderate-income married couples. It will more quickly phase in so married couples in the low- and moderate-income range will see much quicker marriage tax relief.

But I would also note, unfortunately because of the arcane rules of Congress, not of the House but of the other body, that the Bush tax cut was forced to be temporary which means it expires at a certain point; and the 100 million American taxpayers who have seen their taxes lowered, which is everybody who pays income taxes has seen their income taxes lowered, and 3.9 million families with children have been totally removed from the income tax rolls, which means thanks to the Bush tax cut, they no longer pay income taxes, they will see those taxes reimposed unless we make permanent the Bush tax cut.

Now for couples like Jose and Magdalena Castillo of Joliet, Illinois, they are going to see their marriage tax penalty reimposed; and they will be suffering it once again unless we make the Bush tax cut permanent.

I am proud to say that this House under the leadership of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. HASTERT) and the gentleman from California (Mr. THOMAS), the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and the persistence and convictions of the House Republican majority, we have voted in the House to make the Bush tax cut permanent because we do not want to see couples such as Jose and Magdalena Castillo of Joliet, Illinois, have to pay that marriage tax penalty again. It is wrong; it is unfair. And it is wrong that under our Tax Code, married couples paid higher taxes just because they are married.

My hope is before the end of this year that we will be able to obtain bipartisan support in both the House and Senate for adoption of a permanency for the Bush tax cut, for marriage tax penalty relief, for elimination of the death tax, for across-the-board rate reductions, for retirement savings as well as the opportunities to save for college education.

Those are good things; but unfortunately, they are temporary. Unless we make the Bush tax cut permanent, all of those things, marriage tax penalty relief, death tax repeal, retirement savings opportunities by increased contributions to IRAs and 401(k)s, an opportunity to see taxes lowered overall because of rate reductions for everyone, those taxes are going to go back up. Let us make the Bush tax cut permanent. Let us help couples such as Jose and Magdalena Castillo see their marriage tax penalty eliminated permanently. Let us get the Senate and the House to make the Bush tax cut permanent.

RECESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 12 of rule I, the Chair declares the House in recess until 2 p.m. today.

Lord of history and source of benevolent providence, You know the times and govern the seasons of life; help Your servants who work in the House of Representatives to seize the opportunity of the present moment and give You glory.

As Members assemble today, may they be encouragement to one another. May those who are dealing with illness or the great loss of a loved one be consoled. Assure them, by Your spirit, that You are with them in their every need.

Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

Mr. REHBERG. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to clause 1, rule I, I demand a vote on agreeing to the Speaker's approval of the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the Speaker's approval of the Journal.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. REHBERG. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 8, rule XX, further proceedings on this question will be postponed.

The point of no quorum is considered withdrawn.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Texas (Mr. LAMPSON) come forward and lead the House in the Pledge of Allegiance.

Mr. LAMPSON led the Pledge of Allegiance as follows:

> I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

OVERDUE BOOKS AND CHILD PORNOGRAPHY

(Mr. PITTS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PITTS. Mr. Speaker, I read in the paper recently about a woman from Hazelton, Pennsylvania, who was thrown in jail because she had three overdue library books. Theresa Keller's husband used her library card to check out three library books 2 years ago and never returned them. Well, not long afterwards, Mrs. Keller found herself living in a domestic violence shelter. She did not even know about the books. Nevertheless, the judge through her in jail for several days for failing to pay her library fines.

Now, while all of this was happening, the Supreme Court of the United States ruled that virtual child pornography was legal. It seems the Supreme Court thinks that everyone has a constitutional right to child pornography on the computer. So my question is this: How is it that the American judicial system is throwing women in jail for overdue library books but at the same time telling pornographers that they are free to continue to make child pornography on computers?

Mr. Speaker, something is very wrong here.

CHILD ONLINE PROTECTION ACT

(Mr. LAMPSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LAMPSON. Mr. Speaker, again I digress from my story of Ludwig Koonz who is in Italy and most anxious to return to the United States of America. I rise to congratulate the Supreme Court on its decision to partially uphold the Child Online Protection Act.

The 1998 law was designed to stop children from gaining access to sexual material on the Internet. As the founder and chair of the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus, I am glad to see that the Supreme Court agreed with Congress that community standards protecting children should be applied to the World Wide Web.

We have seen an attack lately on the laws designed to protect children from pornography and exploitation, and we all must work together to make sure that children remain protected. I urge Members to join the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FOLEY) and me in our work to protect innocent children from the business of sex and pornography. Please support the Child Modeling Exploitation Act of 2002, which would ban exploitative child modeling, banning all Web sites that charge fees to view models 16 years of age and under that do not promote products or services beyond the child.

The children in these sites are in contact with the customers through e-mail and in some more extreme cases through actual meetings. They put children in great danger both psychological and physical.

I urge Members to join the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FOLEY) and me and work to end this horrendous practice.

DON VONARX AND KEN WHITTAKER, STARS OF LIFE

(Mr. GIBBONS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, last week I had a wonderful opportunity to meet two exceptional emergency technicians from Reno, Nevada: Don Vonarx and Ken Whittaker.

These two Reno EMTs were recently granted the Stars of Life Award which is the highest honor given in their professional field. Don and Ken are tremendous examples of tenacious, compassionate, and remarkable individuals who have shown courage and leadership in their professional commitment.

Whether training hundreds of emergency care providers, deploying lifesaving equipment to those in need, or designing speciality EMT classes for people of every age, these gentlemen have shown extraordinary success in helping to save lives throughout Nevada. Their success is reflected in both their accomplishments and especially in their professional and personal relationships with student and colleagues.

We are truly blessed to have both Don Vonarx and Ken Whittaker working as emergency medical technicians in my home town of Reno, and I am honored to know them both.

HONORING THE SUFFOLK COUNTY POLICE DEPARTMENT

(Mr. ISRAEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ISRAEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to welcome to Washington and into the people's House the brave men and women of the Suffolk County Police Department who join with us today as part of a national commemoration at the National Police Memorial. And I want to thank them for the heroic and dedicated work they do.

On September 11, my district on Long Island lost over 102 people in the World Trade Center attack. On September 11 we realized that we had heros and heroines in our midst. It should not have taken September 11 for us to understand just how vitally important they are. We should celebrate that every day. And I am glad that the men and women of the Suffolk County Police Department could join us on this day.

TRUTH IN DOMAIN NAMES ACT

(Mr. PENCE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PENCE. Mr. Speaker, the Internet can be a force for good or a force for evil. At its best the Web is used to disseminate information and provide educational materials to children. Teachers and parents often encourage children to turn to the Internet for research on school projects; but certain Web sites, Mr. Speaker, intentionally use misleading names to lead children into exposure to pornography.

Last week I sought to address this problem on the Internet with H.R. 4658, the Truth in Domain Names Act. The bill would punish those who use misleading domain names to attract children to pornographic Internet sites, who can be fined up to $250,000 or face 2 years in prison.

The Good Book tells us that whoever causes one of the least of these little ones to sin ought to have a millstone tied around his neck. While we cannot legislate that retribution, Mr. Speaker, surely we can pass the Truth in Domain Names Act. It penalizes those who would lead children to view this prurient material. I urge my colleagues in this institution to join many of us on both sides of the aisle to support the Truth in Domain Names Act.

ABOLISH NUCLEAR ARMS

(Mr. KUCINICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KUCINICH. Mr. Speaker, seemingly when the United States and Russia would get together to announce an arms reduction treaty, that would be important news for the world. I think any time the United States and Russia sit down and talk about what can be done to eliminate nuclear weapons is an important moment. However, the announcement by President Bush and Vladimir Putin that they will sign a nuclear pact needs to be scrutinized very carefully.

If you read today's New York Times you see they say that "the proposed treaty sets no pace for dismantling weapons over the next decade, as long as the total number of strategic weapons does not exceed 2,200 in 2012. It permits the United States to stockpile the dismantled weapons in a form that would allow them to be reinstalled on missiles or aboard nuclear armed submarines in case of an ugly turn of events with any major nuclear power. In short, it is an agreement filled with escape clauses."

The only way that we can really protect the world against nuclear arms is to work for complete nuclear abolition. That is something that this administration has taken a path away from. It has taken a path towards deconstructing the nonproliferation treaty towards building new nuclear weapons and towards nuclear proliferation. This treaty that has been described does not do anything to bring the world one step away from the abyss.

DISASTER RELIEF FOR MONTANA

(Mr. REHBERG asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. REHBERG. Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of American farmers and ranchers to ask this Congress to support disaster relief assistance this year.

Montana's farmers and ranchers are entering their fifth, and some cases their sixth, straight year of devastating drought conditions. When floods ravage the Southwest or when hurricanes touch down along the coastal regions of the United States, this Congress has acted forcefully and rightly to offer immediate and substantial financial assistance to those families and businesses most in need.

On behalf of producers of food in more than a dozen States suffering from the most severe disaster conditions in more than a generation, I ask this Congress to act with equal diligence to offer immediate assistance before it is finally too late.

HONORING THE NATIONAL GUARD

(Mr. WILSON of South Carolina asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, in May we celebrate National Military Appreciation Month. This month we are reminded to actively honor and support all of our men and women in uniform who voluntarily risk their lives so we may achieve peace through strength.

I would like to give special recognition to America's oldest military branch, the National Guard, which has celebrated 365 years of service. As a son of a World War II veteran, myself a colonel in the South Carolina Army National Guard and with three sons in the military, I have seen the service the Guard provides in defense of America's homeland.

My colleagues are extraordinary people who train year-round and are ready at a moment's notice to leave their families and jobs to defend liberty. In South Carolina we are fortunate to have dedicated leadership with Adjutant General Stan Spears.

Most recently in the war against terrorism, over 50,000 Guardsmen and women have been called to duty. Today's National Guard continues its historic dual mission: protecting life and property within our borders while providing units trained, equipment, and ready to defend the United States and its interests all over the globe.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Souder) and the gentlewoman from the Virgin Islands (Mrs. Christensen) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Souder).

Mr. Souder. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

President Theodore Roosevelt fostered a conservation legacy when in 1903 he established the first national wildlife refuge, the Pelican Island National Wildlife Refuge. It was the first time the Federal Government set aside land just for the sake of wildlife. It has now become the National Wildlife Refuge System and includes more than 530 refuges and thousands of waterfowl production areas.

Americans have a passion for their land, and national wildlife refuges embody this unique American tradition of public land protection and stewardship. By visiting and supporting national wildlife refuges, Americans will experience those feelings that God provides us, peace, solitude, comfort, safety and a sense of something greater than ourselves.

National wildlife refuges protect America's last wild places. They are the only Federal public lands where protecting fish and wildlife habitat is the first priority.

National wildlife refuges are America's outdoor classroom. Several million students and adults learn each year about the natural world on national wildlife refuges.

National wildlife refuges are the cornerstone of many local economies. Many refuges are tourist destinations, and that means dollars spent in surrounding communities. It is estimated that visitors to refuges spend over $400 million annually in local economies.

National wildlife refuges help maintain our heritage by providing places for present and future generations to hunt, fish and connect with the outdoors.

America's commitment to the National Wildlife Refuge System makes it the world's leader in wildlife conservation. Next year's Centennial of the National Wildlife Refuge System will celebrate America's tradition of wildlife conservation.

As the author of this bill before us, I am pleased that the House is now poised to establish a new concession policy for our National Wildlife Refuge System. It was during one of our family visits to Sanibel Island to the Ding Darling National Wildlife Refuge that I first learned and discovered that the facilities and equipment used by concessionaires were generally not in as good a condition as they should be, and in some cases in dire shape. Refuge manager Lou Hinds spent many hours with me there and since explaining in detail the problems that we have been facing in our national wildlife refuges.

Under current law, the Fish and Wildlife Service is prohibited from using funds paid by a concessionaire to maintain or repair refuge structures. Furthermore, with a maintenance backlog of over $630 million, property used for a concession operation will never become a priority.

During committee consideration, we learned there are about 20 wildlife refuges that offer various concession services to the visiting public. These services range from canoe rentals, bookstores, nature guides and ferries to remote refuge areas. In almost every case concessionaires are using property owned by the Fish and Wildlife Service that is in poor condition.

In addition, refuge managers have signed a number of creative legal arrangements with concessionaires. These have included contracts, special use permits, leases and cooperative agreements. In some cases, these agreements stipulate the obligations of each party, but regrettably these details are lacking in a majority of those arrangements. This means that decisions can be arbitrary by the refuge manager at times or, in fact, concessionaires could damage essential habitat.

This legislation will solve those problems by establishing for the first time a workable, consistent and defensible refuge concession policy. Under H.R. 1370, the Fish and Wildlife Service will be allowed to credit a concessionaire for any fees they pay in the future. This money will be retained at the local refuge and it can be used to build, maintain and repair structural problems, to restore habitat and to protect refuge resources. The Service will determine if a certain repair is necessary, and they will obtain estimates for any proposed work.

In addition, the bill requires the Director of the Fish and Wildlife Service to establish a standardized concession contract within 18 months of the enactment of this bill. This contract will be used by all new and existing concessionaires in the future.

This provision provides consistency throughout the refuge system, stipulates that contracts are issued under a competitive bidding process and clarifies the financial obligations that an entrepreneur must agree to before undertaking a concession.

Finally, the bill requires an annual report on the number of refuge units with concessions, a description of services offered, an accounting of fees paid by the concessionaires and a summary of all improvements made in both visitor services and structures within the refuge system. This is similar to the concessions policy Congress developed and passed and is now law regarding our National Park System. It is way past time that we do the same for our Fish and Wildlife System.

I believe this legislation will encourage improvements within our refuge system. It will foster the growth of additional concession services, and it will enhance the public's ability to appreciate the natural wonders of our National Wildlife Refuge System.

I want to thank all of my colleagues, especially the subcommittee chairman, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. GILCHREST), for their hard work on this important legislation, and I urge an aye vote on H.R. 1370.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mrs. CHRISTENSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the bill that is before the House today is considerably different than the legislation introduced last year. It reflects the hard work of my colleague the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. SOUDER) and the careful consideration of the Committee on Resources, and as presently amended, H.R. 1370 has the potential to enhance the visiting public's experience at our national wildlife refuges. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

The National Wildlife Refuge System is presently saddled with a significant $1.3 billion operations and maintenance budget backlog. Concessionaires which operate in the refuges and offer a wide variety of services, such as we have heard, are uniquely affected by this backlog.

Presently, most concessionaires pay annual franchise fees to the National Wildlife Refuge Fund. The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, which runs the refuge system and owns the land and facilities, is responsible for maintaining all facilities. However, the Service gives low priority to concessionaire facilities when faced with other competing budget demands within the system. This inferior status leaves concessionaire facilities lacking and discourages concessionaires from using the refuges and providing services to visitors.

This legislation would allow the concessionaires to make necessary maintenance repairs or visitor facility improvements in lieu of cash payments for concession fees and would address simultaneously the budget backlog and improve the quality of visitor facilities.

The scope of this new permissive authority has been limited to maintenance backlog projects and other types of small scale improvement projects that increase the visitor's experience. Also, repairs or improvements would be required to be made at the refuge or refuge complex where the concession operates. I note that this legislation would not authorize the construction of any new facilities.

H.R. 1370 has been further amended to address the presently haphazard administrative process by which the Service permits concessionaires to operate within the refuge system. This legislation would require the Service to develop a new standardized concession contract for all national wildlife refuge concession activities. All concession operations would be required to be enrolled under these new contracts within 3 years.

The Service also will be required to award all contracts through competitive bidding, although the bill would exempt small scale retail operations run by nonprofit volunteer organizations, and to ensure accountability the Service will be required to forward to Congress an annual oversight report on all concession contract activities.

Perhaps most important, the bill has been amended to specify that all title interests to property and facilities and any interest in repairs or improvements made by concessionaires will remain with the Federal Government. Furthermore, H.R. 1370 states explicitly that concessionaires do not acquire any compensable interest in the property and facilities they operate or in any repair or improvement they might make.

In closing, H.R. 1370 will provide additional financial flexibility to address the chronic maintenance backlog hindering visitor services at numerous refuges. This legislation will bring much needed coherence to the administration of concession contracts, enhance the public's enjoyment and appreciation of our National Wildlife Refuge System and prevent the future establishment of concession activities that are incompatible with the refuge system's wildlife first mission.

I want to once again commend our colleague the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. SOUDER) on this legislation. I urge Members to support it and to improve our national wildlife refuges.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further speakers, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SOUDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. SOUDER) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 1370, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend the National Wildlife Refuge System Administration Act of 1966 to establish requirements for the award of concessions in the National Wildlife Refuge System, to provide for maintenance and repair of properties located in the System by concessionaires authorized to use such properties, and for other purposes.".

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NUTRIA ERADICATION AND MARSHLAND RESTORATION ACT

Mr. SOUDER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 4044) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to provide assistance to the State of Maryland for implementation of a program to eradicate nutria and restore marshland damaged by nutria, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 4044

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. FINDINGS AND PURPOSES.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds the following:

(1) Wetlands and tidal marshes of the Chesapeake Bay and in Louisiana provide significant cultural, economic, and ecological benefits to the Nation.

(2) The South American nutria (Myocastor coypus) is directly contributing to substantial marsh loss in Maryland and Louisiana on Federal, State, and private land.

(3) Traditional harvest methods to control or eradicate nutria have failed in Maryland and have had limited success in the eradication of nutria in Louisiana. Consequently, marsh loss is accelerating.

(4) The nutria eradication and control pilot program authorized by Public Law 105–322 is to develop new and effective methods for eradication of nutria.

(b) PURPOSE.—The purpose of this Act is to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to provide financial assistance to the State of Maryland and the State of Louisiana for a program to implement measures to eradicate or control nutria and restore marshland damaged by nutria.

SEC. 2. NUTRIA ERADICATION PROGRAM.

(a) GRANT AUTHORITY.—The Secretary of the Interior (in this section referred to as the "Secretary"), subject to the availability of appropriations, may provide financial assistance to the State of Maryland and the State of Louisiana for a program to implement measures to eradicate or control nutria and restore marshland damaged by nutria.

(b) GOALS.—The goals of the program shall be to—

(1) eradicate nutria in Maryland;

(2) eradicate or control nutria in Louisiana and other States; and

(3) restore marshland damaged by nutria.

(c) ACTIVITIES.—In the State of Maryland, the Secretary shall require that the program consist of management, research, and public education activities carried out in accordance with the document published by the United States Fish and Wildlife Service entitled "Eradication Strategies for Nutria in the Chesapeake and Delaware Bay Watersheds", dated March 2002.

(d) COST SHARING.—

(1) FEDERAL SHARE.—The Federal share of the costs of the program may not exceed 75 percent of the total costs of the program.

(2) IN-KIND CONTRIBUTIONS.—The non-Federal share of the costs of the program may be provided in the form of in-kind contributions of materials or services.

(e) LIMITATION ON ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSES.—Not more than 5 percent of financial assistance provided by the Secretary under this section may be used for administrative expenses.

(f) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—For financial assistance under this section, there is authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary $4,000,000 for the State of Maryland program and $2,000,000 for the State of Louisiana program for each of fiscal years 2003, 2004, 2005, 2006, and 2007.

SEC. 3. REPORT.

No later than 6 months after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary and the National Invasive Species Council shall—

(1) give consideration to the 2002 report for the Louisiana Department of Wildlife and Fisheries titled "Nutria in Louisiana", and the 2002 document entitled "Eradication Strategies for Nutria in the Chesapeake and Delaware Bay Watersheds"; and

(2) develop, in cooperation with the State of Louisiana Department of Wildlife and Fisheries and the State of Maryland Department of Natural Resources, a long-term nutria control or eradication program, as appropriate, with the objective to significantly reduce and restore the damage nutria cause to coastal wetlands in the States of Louisiana and Maryland.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. SOUDER) and the gentlewoman from the Virgin Islands (Mrs. CHRISTENSEN) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. SOUDER).

Mr. SOUDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

The sponsor of this legislation, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. GILCHREST), the Subcommittee on Fisheries Conservation, Wildlife and Oceans chairman, has been working on this issue for many years. In fact, in 1998 Congress enacted a law he sponsored that created the Maryland Nutria Control Pilot Project, and let me briefly, for those who are not aware, as I was not, this is a nutria. It is basically a South American, somewhat of an overgrown rat, smaller sized groundhog, but it is a nonnative species that is destroying the environment in certain areas of our country.

Since that time, Federal, State and local partners have worked together to develop an effective strategy on how to address the tremendous amount of environmental destruction that is being caused by an increasing population of a semi-aquatic, non-native rodent known as nutria. This partnership has conducted various studies on the rate of wetland destruction, the reproductive capacity of nutria and alternatives to control or eradicate this species from the Blackwater National Wildlife Refuge, the Fishing Bay Wildlife Management Area and Tudor Farms.

The results of the environmental impact studies were shocking. Nutria have no natural predators in Maryland and they have already consumed nearly half of the wetland marshlands at the Blackwater National Wildlife Refuge. The remaining acreage is in serious peril. Unless nutria are stopped, they will continue to destroy wetlands at Blackwater, the other eight wildlife refuges on the Delmarva Peninsula and marshlands throughout the Atlantic Coast. One of the problems we have often in the Fish and Wildlife Service is when the action of humans alter the environment, such as bringing in nonnative species, we often have to intervene to bring back the national environment which would be destroyed.

H.R. 4044 will authorize Public Law 105–322, and it will implement the next step in the process, which is the eradication of nutria and the restoration of wetlands which are vital to the survival of millions of migratory waterfowl, bald and golden eagles and the neotropical songbirds. In their testimony, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service stated that: "The Service recognizes the need to continue cooperative efforts to eradicate nutria in the Chesapeake Bay region and will continue its commitment as a key Federal member of the nutria eradication partnership."

At the full committee markup of this legislation, the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. TAUZIN) successfully offered an amendment to expand the scope of this measure to address nutria in the State of Louisiana. According to the Louisiana Department of Wildlife and Fisheries, these pesky rodents have damaged or destroyed over 100,000 acres of wetlands in their State. Despite extensive efforts and the consumption of thousands of nutria by American alligators, Louisiana's attempt to control their growing nutria population have proven ineffective.

Under the terms of the modified bill, the Secretary of the Interior will undertake steps to control or eradicate nutria in the two States and together with the National Invasive Species Council develop a long-term nutria control and eradication program.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4044 is a carefully crafted bill that will help to solve a serious problem facing Maryland's Eastern Shore and Louisiana's marshlands.

□ 1430

Furthermore, it will serve as a model for other States that may face the prospect of having to fight against an invading population of nutria. I urge an "aye" vote on H.R. 4044.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mrs. CHRISTENSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 4044, legislation that would authorize financial assistance to the States of Maryland and Louisiana to support efforts to eradicate nutria and restore marshland ecosystems.

There is little doubt that nutria, a large member of the rodent family introduced from South America into the United States in the 1930s, has significantly ruined or destroyed coastal wetland habitats in both Maryland and Louisiana.

The range of distribution of this invasive species continues to expand ominously as it searches out new marsh habitat for forage, shelter, and breeding. The need for direct action to address this environmental threat is real and compelling.

H.R. 4044 builds upon the measured success of a pilot program authorized in 1998 which helped develop new methods and strategies for the eradication of nutria and the Chesapeake and Delaware Bay watersheds.

It is hoped that the management, research, and public outreach activities authorized in this bill will enable wildlife biologists in both Maryland and Louisiana to finally get a handle on controlling the widespread environmental damage caused by this noxious aquatic pest.

I urge Members also to support this important invasive-species legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SOUDER. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mrs. CHRISTENSEN. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PENCE). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. SOUDER) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 4044, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read:

"A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to provide assistance to the State of Maryland and the State of Louisiana for implementation of a program to eradicate or control nutria and restore marshland damaged by nutria, and for other purposes.".

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WACO MAMMOTH SITE AREA INTERIOR STUDY ACT

Mr. SOUDER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 1925) to direct the Secretary of the Interior to study the suitability and feasibility of designating the Waco Mammoth Site Area in Waco, Texas, as a unit of the National Park System, and for other purposes, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 1925

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. STUDY AND REPORT REGARDING WACO MAMMOTH SITE AREA.

(a) STUDY.—The Secretary of the Interior, in consultation with the State of Texas, the city of Waco, and other appropriate organizations, shall carry out a special resource study regarding the national significance, suitability, and feasibility of designating the Waco Mammoth Site Area located in the city of Waco, Texas, as a unit of the National Park System.

(b) STUDY PROCESS AND COMPLETION.—Section 8(c) of Public Law 91–383 (16 U.S.C. 1a–5(c)) shall apply to the conduct and completion of the study required by this section.

(c) SUBMISSION OF STUDY RESULTS.—Not later than 3 years after funds are first made available for this section, the Secretary shall submit to the Committee on Resources of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the Senate a report describing the results of the study.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. SOUDER) and the gentlewoman from the Virgin Islands (Mrs. CHRISTENSEN) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. SOUDER).

Mr. SOUDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

H.R. 1925, introduced by my friend and colleague, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. EDWARDS), would direct the Secretary of the Interior to study the suitability and feasibility of designating the Waco Mammoth Site Area in Waco, Texas, as a unit of the National Park System.

Located near the confluence of the Brazos and Bosque Rivers, the Mammoth Site has become internationally known, as it contains the remains of the largest known herd of Colombian mammoths, warm weather cousins to the wooly mammoth, dying from the same event. To date, 22 mammoths have been found at the site that date back 28,000 years.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is supported by the majority and minority of the committee. In addition, the bill is supported by the administration, with the ongoing caveat that the maintenance backlog be addressed first.

I would like to add my personal congratulations and interest in this. When I was student body president at Indiana Purdue, Fort Wayne, through the geology club they promoted the nickname "The Mastedons." It was my honor to drive through, over the objection of many, mastedons as the school name, which has stood for over 30 years. They are kind of big cousins to the mammoths.

So I am glad to see we are working to preserve this site so that we can have this for future generations to understand better the natural processes that occurred in this country and the creatures that were here before us. So, Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 1925, as amended.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mrs. CHRISTENSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 1925, introduced by my good friend and colleague, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. EDWARDS), directs the Secretary of the Interior to study the suitability and feasibility of designating the Waco Mammoth Site in Waco, Texas, as a unit of the National Park System.

The Waco Mammoth Site is believed to contain the remains of the largest concentration of mammoths killed during a single event. The site is located close to the confluence of the Brazos and Bosque Rivers near the city of Waco, Texas. The discovery of these mammoth remains has received international attention and Baylor University in the City of Waco have been working to protect the site.

In hearings before the Committee on Resources, we received testimony on the unique paleontological resources found on this site. The study called for by H.R. 1925 will examine what role, if any, that the National Park Service can play in the protection and interpretation of these unique resources.

Mr. Speaker, I want to commend my colleague, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. EDWARDS). I support the bill, as amended, and look forward to its passage by the House today.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the sponsor of the bill, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. EDWARDS).

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I want to first thank the gentlewoman from the Virgin Islands (Mrs. CHRISTENSEN) for yielding me this time and for her courtesy and leadership on this legislation. I also want to commend and thank my colleague, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. SOUDER), for his courtesies, his comments, as well as his leadership and long understanding of the importance of these types of historic sites in our country as a way to educate future generations of young people in America about our history.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 1925 is called the Waco Mammoth Site Study Bill; and as mentioned, it authorizes the study by the National Park Service to consider including the Waco Mammoth Site as a unit in the National Park System. Since there are numerous different designations in the National Park System, one of the goals of this study would be to determine the best fit for this historic site.

Mr. Speaker, as we have also heard, the Waco Mammoth Site is the largest concentration in the world of prehistoric mammoths dying from the same event. That is what makes this particular site unique and so historically significant. It is located within the city limits of Waco, Texas, my hometown, which also happens to be a suburb of the community of Crawford, Texas, a well-known central Texas community today. It is located at the confluence of the Brazos and Bosque Rivers.

The site was first discovered in 1978; and since 1984, Calvin Smith, director of the Strecker Museum at Baylor University, has been leading the effort to discovering the bones of now, I think there are even up to 24 mammoths so far. We would not be here today had it not been for the vision and dedication of Calvin Smith, and I want to thank him for his role in this legislation.

What makes this site unique, as I mentioned, is the fact that so many, in fact this could be twice the size of any previous mammoth deaths at any one site for any one given cause. What I find absolutely fascinating about it is that in the mud, again considering this was 28,000 years ago, we now have the remains of a 55-year-old bull and a 45-year-old female mammoth as they tried to lift their young calves above the flood that consumed them all. It is my understanding that this is the first known recording in history of parental instincts being shown in a prehistoric setting such as this.

This discovery has received worldwide attention. Experts such as Dr. Gary Haynes at the University of Nevada at Reno have said this site is a valuable and unique treasure that should not be lost. Dr. Haynes states the mammoth site, and I quote, "is a part of America's rich heritage from the far past, when a much more diverse animal community populated the continent."

This site can be valued as a learning tool for school children across Texas and our country, as well as a site for study by professionals. Mr. Speaker, I ask the House to approve this bill, thus bringing an invaluable archeological find one step closer to being part, as I hope, and as it should, a unit of the National Park System.

I thank all of my colleagues for their courtesy, again, their leadership; and finally, Mr. Speaker, if I could just say that nothing ever happens positive in this country or in this Congress without a real team effort, and there were a lot of folks back home as well as here in Washington that worked on this. I want to thank the gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN), the chairman of the Committee on Resources, for his support; the gentleman from West Virginia (Mr. RAHALL), the ranking member, for his support; the gentleman from California (Mr. RADANOVICH); the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. HEFLEY); the gentlewoman from the Virgin Islands (Mrs. CHRISTENSEN); and the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. SOUDER). Again, we would not be here today without their leadership.

And back home, those who first had this vision and have worked to protect this site for years without Federal help so far, the city of Waco, its leadership, represented by Mayor Linda Etheridge and the Waco City Council and staff; people such as Margaret Mills; my friend Sam Jack McGlassen, now diseased, who originally donated this property to the city of Waco, Baylor University, for its important role in this effort; and people such as Allen Samuels and Mr. and Mrs. Buddy Bostick and so many others, who care about preserving our important history for future generations.

I urge, Mr. Speaker, the House to vote in support of H.R. 1925.

Mrs. CHRISTENSEN. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SOUDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume to conclude by saying that we are looking forward to seeing the continuing development and study by the National Park Service. Our National Park Service is not just great wild places; it is also important cultural and archeological finds, such as Dinosaur National Park, such as Mesa Verde, and other types of archeological finds.

This also proves that Texas not only has the biggest cattle, they at one time had the big mammoths. Even before there were people, they had huge mammoth ranches, apparently.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. SOUDER) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 1925, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. SOUDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks and to include extraneous material in the RECORD on the three bills just considered, H.R. 1370, H.R. 1925, and H.R. 4044.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks and to include extraneous material on the bill now under consideration, H.R. 2051.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON) control 10 minutes of the time in favor of the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SMITH) is recognized.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

This legislation deals with a couple areas of research that the National Science Foundation is now involved in, and I would suggest that not only for the sake of this country but for the sake of the developing world that we move ahead with the kind of research in genetic modification that has the potential of not only reducing the price for farmers but that can help people. It will help people by giving a little additional priority to making sure that the products that are developed have that goal.

□ 1445

Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Science Subcommittee on Research, we held a number of hearings on plant genomics, and what I learned led me to issue a report on "Plant Genomic Research to Improve Agriculture, Human Health and the Environment."

This legislation builds on the NSF's success in funding merit-based competitive research by establishing two genomic initiatives at NSF: First, the plant genome plant gene expression research centers; and, two, the suggestion and legislation by the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON), the partnerships for plant biotechnology in the developing world. The bill authorizes $9 million for fiscal year 2002, and $13.5 million for fiscal years 2003 and 2004 to carry out these activities.

What are we going to do with our new technology to make sure that we help people in this country and the rest of the world? And that is what these bills are all about, to make sure we move in that direction.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today in strong support of H.R. 2051, the Regional Plant Genome and Gene Research Expression Act. H.R. 2051 has been a collaborative effort between me and the chairman of the Subcommittee on Science, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SMITH). I also thank the gentleman from New York (Chairman BOEHLERT), and the gentleman from Texas (Mr. HALL), the ranking member, for their leadership in bringing this important piece of legislation to the floor.

This legislation was developed last fall because I believe we are only just beginning to unlock the potential of agricultural biotechnology. We have witnessed some of the benefits genetically improved crops have brought to American farmers, and it is time that farmers around the world are also able to enjoy the benefits of agricultural biotechnology.

H.R. 2051 establishes a competitive, merit-reviewed grant program under the National Science Foundation to award grants to eligible entities to conduct basic research on crops that can be grown in the developing world. The research supported by these grants will help scientists discover innovative solutions to some of the developing world's most intractable problems, such as hunger, malnutrition, and disease.

Last September, the House Subcommittee on Research held a hearing on the two bills that became H.R. 2051 as considered here today. The witnesses testified on the importance of Federal funding for basic research on developing world crops and indicated that this legislation fills an important funding gap in our current research environment. The witnesses also were enthusiastic about the partnership aspect of this legislation because collaborative research projects between the U.S. and developing world scientists will help develop the scientific capacity of developing nations as well as expand partnership opportunities for U.S. scientists.

The potential of basic research on developing world crops is enormous, and scientists have already produced some encouraging results. Many of us are familiar with a newly developed strain of golden rice that was developed by plant scientists to have increased Vitamin A and iron content. Golden rice was developed because Vitamin A deficiency causes more than 1 million childhood deaths each year and is the single most prevalent cause of blindness among children in developing countries. Golden rice is only the beginning of the potential benefits of biotechnology for the developing world. Biotechnology can help develop crop varieties that are resistant to insects, viruses, that can be grown in drought-stricken lands with only minimal amounts of water, that have improved nutritional content, and that vaccinate against life-threatening illnesses.

Dr. Norman Borlaug, a distinguished professor at Texas A&M University, father of the Green Revolution, and recipient of the 1970 Nobel Peace Prize, stated in yesterday's Wall Street Journal that "Africa desperately needs the simple, effective, high-yield farming systems that have made the First World's food supply safe and secure." The technology developed through agricultural biotechnology and encapsulated in a seed is such a system. Biotechnology will not solve all of the developing world's problems, but it does have an important role to play in increasing food security and food self-sufficiency in the developing world.

Improving agriculture in the developing world often ranks low on the list of our Nation's priorities. Yet I can think of few things that are more important to our Nation's security and future prosperity than fostering stable, productive economies throughout the world. Such global stability will not take place as long as hunger, malnutrition, and disease ravage the majority of the world's population. Fortunately, we are at a time and a place where we can take positive steps to improve the lives of people around the world, and I believe H.R. 2051 makes a small, but important, contribution to this struggle.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SMITH) for working with me in a collaborative, bipartisan effort on this bill. I urge Members to vote in favor of the legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. KUCINICH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I call the House's attention to a document from the Southern African Seed-Initiative which states in part with regard to the restoration of sustainable agriculture in the future, "We are appealing to the regional international community and to organization in disaster relief and development assistance to take precautions: 1, to prevent the importation of inappropriate seeds to the southern Africa region which can undermine agrobiodiversity and thus food security for years; and 2, to support efforts to reconstitute locally adapted planning material and quality seed material/varieties, like indigenous landraces or farmers' varieties appropriate to the various ecosystems" this sheet goes on to claim: "Food aid, combined with the importation of often poorly adapted seed varieties, can lower yields and keep them low for years."

This information from the Seed Initiative from Southern Africa is very instructive, and reflects most seriously on the matter at hand because the truth of the matter is that all of us in this House who are very concerned about reducing hunger in the world must be careful not to create a circumstance that in our desire to use technologies that seemingly could reduce hunger, that we inadvertently use technologies which are poorly adapted to seed varieties that can end up actually increasing hunger.

Mr. Speaker, I oppose H.R. 2051, the Regional Plant Genome and Gene Expression Research Act. The bill before us is well-intentioned, but I believe it is based on an erroneous assumption. The legislation assumes that unproven technologies will solve the very serious international problem of world hunger. Technologies like genetically engineered food may have a limited role, but economics and the politics of repressive political regimes remain the significant barrier to a consistent food supply in developing nations.

The development of expensive genetically engineered foods may only exacerbate the situation. There are better alternatives. Agroecological interventions have had significantly more success in helping developing nations feed themselves with higher yields and improved environmental practices, all within reasonable costs for developing countries.

These alternatives do not further enrich the consolidated agricultural industry, but they can provide the poorest of citizens of a nation the opportunity to survive on their own means. Next week I am introducing the Real Solutions to World Hunger Act of 2002, which promotes this type of research that can quickly and effectively save millions of lives. The legislation before us today promotes a technology which is incompatible with the problem.

The cause of world hunger has more to do with inadequate food distribution than food production. The world today produces more food per inhabitant than ever before. Enough food is available now to provide 4.3 pounds for every person each day. That information from Food First/Institute for Food and Development Policy.

The poor nutrition of millions is not due to a shortage in food, but rather to problems of distribution. Why was Ethiopia exporting food during its famine in the 1980s? In an economy that is becoming increasingly market driven, food is sold to the highest bidder. But at a more fundamental level, appalling land distribution policies favoring large landowners leave land idle preventing people from growing their own food. The landless poor are at the mercy of the cash economy to buy food.

This legislation follows the biotechnology industry strategy by employing bait and switch. Almost all genetic alterations are done to make food production and processing easier and more profitable for the manufacturers. A minuscule amount of research is aimed at improved nutrition, although biotechnology companies heavily advertise this tiny amount of research. In general, their crops are being engineered to increase corporate profitability, not to alleviate world hunger.

During the 5-year period 1996 to 2000, herbicide tolerance accounted for 74 percent of genetically engineered plants. Insect resistance for North American insects, not insects in developing countries, accounted for 19 percent of genetically engineered plants, and stacked genes for herbicide tolerance and insect resistance accounted for 7 percent, this according to the International Service for the Acquisition of Agribiotech Applications.

When added up, that leaves no commercialized crops that provide any benefits for the poor and developing nations. I quote from a statement made to the United Nations by delegates from 24 African states in 1998: "We object strongly that the image of the poor and hungry from our countries is being used by giant, multinational corporations to push a technology that is neither safe, environmentally friendly, nor economically beneficial to us. We do not believe that such companies or gene technologies will help our farmers to produce the food that is needed in the 21st century. On the contrary, we think that it will destroy the diversity, the local knowledge, and the sustainable agricultural systems that our farmers have developed for millennia; and it will thus undermine our capacity to feed ourselves."

□ 1500

So here again, the best intentions seemingly to help address and eradicate hunger in developing nations can in fact end up creating conditions that promote more hunger. So if African nations, according to their representatives, do not want it, then who does besides the biotechnology public relations consultants?

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I agree with much of what the gentleman from Ohio says, because that is part of our concern in this bill. What it calls for is more research. More research is going to include not only what it can do for people but also to increase the safety of any resulting product.

The gentleman mentioned that a lot of the private research so far in this area has been to simply increase profits. That is the kind of private research in genomics that have been directed at plant products that can be sold because they increase yield or they reduce the cost for the farmer. If we are going to have the kind of research that helps people, there is no doubt that Federal funding for genomic research is important, that research in areas possibly has no profit potential but that can help alleviate poverty, that can protect the environment, that can improve human health, and that can reduce our overdependence on petroleum products.

Reducing our dependency on petrolium energy is one of the areas that I have been concerned about. We have the potential to enhance the nitrogen-fixing capability of agricultural plants. Right now nitrogen fertilizer uses up approximately 6 percent of the natural gas in this country. If we can enhance the legumes the nodules that are now in the clovers, in the soybeans, in the alfalfas, to fix that nitrogen in the soil much more effectively and efficiently and we have that potential, then we are going to reduce our dependence on energy.

Let me say that the Wall Street Journal yesterday ran an editorial by Norman Borlaug, best known as the Father of the Green Revolution. His work in developing higher yielding varieties of rice and wheat is credited with saving perhaps 1 billion people in China and India from starvation in the 1970s. Borlaug is now devoted to bringing about similar advancements in Africa where starvation remains all too common. What is his solution? His solution is to develop high yield varieties of traditional African crops such as cowpeas, cassava and how can we get there in part through biotechnology which has already shown promise for producing plants that are more tolerant to drought or can grow in soils that are too base or too acidy or too salty that they cannot grow those crops now.

I would hope the gentleman would consider supporting this bill to give us the kind of research to not only ensure the safety that some are concerned about, that he is concerned about and that I am concerned about and that the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON) is concerned about, but to develop the kind of products that can help people, not simply reduce the price to farmers.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I thank the gentleman from Ohio for his comments and would like to respond. I believe he misunderstands this bill. The thrust of this bill is one of basic research at universities. The bill seeks to address the deficiency in basic genomic research on crops that can be grown in the developing world.

More importantly, the bill seeks to create strong partnerships with developing world institutions from the very beginning. In order to be eligible for funds under section 4 of this bill, research institutions are required to partner with their colleagues in developing countries. This partnership will not only help strengthen the scientific capacity of developing countries but will ensure that the basic research that is performed focuses on what developing countries perceive their own needs to be. Additionally, the bill allows for research on the impact of plant biotechnology on the social, political and environmental conditions in countries in the developing world. This provision will allow researchers to investigate many of the claims that my colleague from Ohio raises.

This bill does not force farmers in developing countries to adopt fancy technologies. It does not force the importation of genetically altered foods outside the country. On the contrary, it seeks to encourage the adoption of the very simple technology of a better seed that was developed in conjunction with scientists from the developing world.

All of us here recognize that world hunger is an enormously complex problem with no simple solution. This bill does not pretend to hold the answer. What this bill does is provide the means for scientists in the United States and in developing countries to work together to contribute to the much larger solution to the very serious problem of hunger, malnutrition and disease in the developing world.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. KUCINICH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 6 minutes. I want to thank the gentleman from Michigan and the gentlewoman from Texas for their commitment to trying to deal with this problem of world hunger. We have differences of opinion about how we can deal with it effectively.

I would suggest that the research which is called for in part of this bill, Mr. Speaker, has already been done. As a matter of fact, in the AgBioForum, volume 2, number 3 and 4, summer and fall of 1999, pages 155 to 162, an article by Miguel Altieri and Peter Rosset, thoroughly researched article, I might add, that claims over 38 academic sources for their conclusions, states the following in the abstract. It says:

> Advocates of biotechnology affirm that the application of genetic engineering to develop transgenic crops will increase world agricultural productivity, enhance food security, and move agriculture away from a dependence on chemical inputs helping to reduce environmental problems. This paper challenges such assertions by first demystifying the Malthusian view that hunger is due to a gap between food production and human population growth. Second, we expose the fact that current bioengineered crops are not designed to increase yields or for poor small farmers, so that they may not benefit from them. In addition, transgenic crops pose serious environmental risks, continuously underplayed by the biotechnology industry. Finally, it is concluded that there are many other agro-ecological alternatives that can solve the agricultural problems that biotechnology aims at solving, but in a much more socially equitable manner and in a more environmentally harmonious way.

In this article, which is entitled Ten Reasons Why Biotechnology Will Not Ensure Food Security, Protect the Environment and Reduce Poverty in the Developing World, Altieri and Rosset point out, number one, there is no relationship between the prevalence of hunger in a given country and its population. For every densely populated and hungry nation like Bangladesh or Haiti, there is a sparsely populated and hungry nation like Brazil and Indonesia.

The second point they make, number two, most innovations in agricultural biotechnology have been profit-driven rather than need-driven. The real thrust of the genetic engineering industry is not to make Third World agriculture more productive, but rather to generate profits.

Number three, the integration of the seed and chemical industries appears destined to accelerate increases in per acre expenditures for seeds plus chemicals, delivering significantly lower returns to growers.

Number four, recent experimental trials have shown that genetically engineered seeds do not increase the yield of crops. A recent study by the United States Department of Agriculture Economic Research Service shows that in 1998 yields were not significantly different in engineered versus nonengineered crops in 12 of 18 crop/region combinations.

Number five, many scientists claim that the ingestion of genetically engineered food is harmless. Recent evidence, however, shows that there are potential risks of eating such foods as the new proteins produced in such foods could, one, act themselves as allergens or toxins; two, alter the metabolism of the food producing plant or animal, causing it to produce new allergens or toxins; or, three, reduce its nutritional quality or value.

In this article, Ten Reasons Why Biotechnology Will Not Ensure Food Security, Protect the Environment and Reduce Poverty in the Developing World, the authors as their sixth point indicate transgenic plants which produce their own insecticides closely follow the pesticide paradigm, which is itself rapidly failing due to pest resistance to insecticides.

Number seven, the global fight for market share is leading companies to massively deploy transgenic crops around the world, more than 30 million hectares in 1998, without proper advance testing of short- or long-term impacts on human health and ecosystems.

The next point that the authors make, number eight, there are many unanswered ecological questions regarding the impact of transgenic crops.

Number nine, as the private sector has exerted more and more dominance in advancing new biotechnologies, the public sector has had to invest a growing share of its scarce resources in enhancing biotechnological capacities in public institutions.

And, number 10, much of the needed food can be produced by small farmers located throughout the world using agro-ecological technologies. In fact, new world development approaches and low input technologies spearheaded by farmers and nongovernmental organizations around the world are already making a significant contribution to food security at the household, national and regional levels in Africa, Asia and Latin America.

So again, Mr. Speaker, there already is significant research which points out concerns that need to be regarded before such legislation is brought to the floor.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

The gentleman from Ohio and the gentlewoman from Texas and I, agree on a lot of these issues. The plant genome and gene expression centers will take plant biotechnology research into the next phase, beyond simply mapping and sequencing genes and toward a better understanding of gene expression.

We have got the Aradopsis plant. We have cataloged those genes. We have determined the folding of several of those genes to learn more about what particular genes do. But there is a tremendous void in the information that we need to make sure the new plants are safe.

Let us not argue against having more research. Let us not argue against maybe having government do a little bit of this research instead of leaving it to the private sector that are forced to have some kind of financial rewards for what they do. The centers are going to expand on NSF's current activities in gene research by providing central locations for multidisciplinary interactive approaches to plant biotech research. This will allow researchers to develop the kind of research to allow development of safe and beneficial plant varieties and plant-derived applications.

□ 1515

Specifically in this bill, I would say to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KUCINICH), the centers will conduct research in plant genomics related to the development of the kind of information that can lead to new varieties of enhanced crops, including those grown in nontraditional environments and those grown with reduced reliance on chemical fertilizers. These may include research into enhancing the nitrogen-fixing ability of legumes, that I earlier mentioned. The primary input, of course, of nitrogen is natural gas, so we can make ourselves a little more energy dependent while we increase the safety of the environment.

The centers are also going to expand on current biotechnology efforts that have primarily been focused on improving the production and the cost and the quantity. And exactly like the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KUCINICH) says, we are going to move away from that to the kind of research that is going to give us better information.

I believe we are on the threshold of a new era in food production. Biotechnology will be especially important to poor subsistence farmers across the globe who struggle against the odds to bring in a good crop each year.

To address this problem, H.R. 2051 authorizes a program creating plant biotechnology partnerships for the developing world. This program is based on H.R. 2912, introduced by the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON). The plant biotechnology partnerships will provide the fundamental research needed to build on the current plant biotechnology base to address specific agricultural problems in the developing world.

Mr. KUCINICH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, it has been stated over and over here that the interest here is in just research. However, we cannot separate the kind of research that will be done here from the logic that is driving biotechnology, because this bill states that for-profit companies can be involved in this research.

Now, I agree with my friend from Michigan that we do not want to just leave it to for-profit companies, but it is in the bill. So I would just say that if we do not want for-profit companies involved, I would certainly be willing to entertain a unanimous consent request to strike that provision from this bill.

In addition to that, the total of this bill is $36 million.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KUCINICH. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the language in the bill was not for-profit companies, it is for nonprofit organizations to be involved, so the nonprofits that are interested in something beside profit.

Mr. KUCINICH. Mr. Speaker, reclaiming my time, may I ask the gentleman to make sure that he and I have the same copies of these bills, because often there are reprints and newer iterations. I have here under section 4: "Partnerships for Plant Biotechnology in the Developing World," under number (2), which is line 8. I am going to read it to the gentleman: "In order to be eligible to receive a grant under this section, an institution of higher education or eligible nonprofit organization (or consortium thereof) shall enter into a partnership with one or more developing nations and may also include for-profit companies involved in plant biotechnology."

I will ask the gentleman again, I would certainly entertain the gentleman's willingness to strike that language there so that we can certainly keep the for-profit companies out of this, because, Mr. Speaker, the for-profit companies had a $50 million advertising campaign to try to promote biotechnology, glossing over all the concerns that scientists around the world have, and they get $36 million out of this bill if left to the language of this bill. They could get if that much.

I would be happy to have my good friend respond.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the gentleman will yield further, this is part of the language of the bill of the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON) originally. It does not give these companies the grant. They still go to the universities to make the decision of whether there is going to be any private involvement. That is one thing we have lacked as we searched for money, is trying to get more money in. But certainly they should not be allowed to dictate the kind of research to be done. I certainly appreciate that.

Mr. KUCINICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to strike the language.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LAHOOD). The Chair would announce that the proponent of the motion is the only member that the Chair would recognize to ask unanimous consent to modify the motion.

Mr. KUCINICH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself one more minute.

Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as my unanimous consent request was objected to, it is very clear that there are Members of this House, certainly not the gentleman from Michigan, but there are members of this House who are looking to give the biotech firms a handout under the guise of helping to feed the poor.

Most genetically engineered food products and almost all research funding for the development of genetically engineered food target developing nation agriculture and consumers. Developing countries cannot afford this technology and therefore are vastly ignored.

If the biotechnology industry believes they could help mitigate hunger concerns, domestic or foreign, then requiring biotechnology companies to make available the necessary resources for this purpose is appropriate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BARTON).

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, my late father was a plant geneticist. He spent his entire career developing cotton plants and cotton seeds that could be used as food. I wish we would have had this research enabled when he was alive so he could have participated through grants at Texas A&M or the University of Texas to forward this very worthwhile research endeavor.

Mr. Speaker, I very strongly support the gentlewoman from Texas and the gentleman from Michigan in their noble endeavor.

Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

The gentleman from Ohio just gave all the reasons why this bill should pass. This is a bill on research where it can establish partnerships. The grants can only go to universities and nonprofits. Profit businesses can join the partnership, the consortium, but no money flows in that direction. The paper the gentleman read prior to that last statement is 3 years old. With research, that changes.

This bill only speaks to research and who can be a part of the partnership, of the consortium. It is not public dollars flowing to profit organizations. It is what we will hear more of in the future, public-private-type partnerships. No public dollar flows to a profit organization. The dollars go to the universities, and that is where the research takes place; and it includes persons from the developing countries to be a part of the research.

Mr. Speaker, I would urge passage of this legislation. It is good legislation intended to do a good job.

Mr. KUCINICH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, my legislation which I will be bringing to this House hopefully sometime soon, called the Real Solutions to World Hunger Act of 2002, offers new initiatives and protections to help developing nations resolve their hunger concerns.

First, to protect developing nations, genetically engineered exports are restricted to those already approved in the U.S. and approved by the importing nation.

Second, creation of an international research fund for sustainable agricultural research.

Third, U.S. prohibition on any intervention in a developing nation's effort to mandatorily license a genetically engineered crop.

Fourth, establishing the Sustainable Agriculture Trust Fund with a small tax on a biotechnology company's profits. This trust fund will fund the activities in this bill.

To understand how this bill before us, the one we are going to be voting on today, will fail to help anyone except for the biotechnology companies, I think we should examine our own Nation, our own farming practices and our domestic hunger challenges.

The United States of America, the wealthiest Nation in the world, grows substantial amounts of genetically engineered foods. Our farmers plant approximately 100 million acres a year in genetically engineered crops. However, in this great wealthy Nation of ours, plenty of families go hungry every day. Approximately 4 million low-income children under the age of 12 experience hunger each year, and an additional 9.6 million children are at risk of hunger.

The proponents of this legislation before us believe that genetically engineered foods will solve world hunger. But I question this rationale when we have so much hunger in our own Nation. This technology has not helped a single hungry family in our Nation. These hungry families need a better economy, better paying jobs, access to child care, and a decent education to solve the economic trap that leads to hunger.

It is clear that hunger is something that we must eradicate, but promoting false solutions to provide great public relations for a troubled industry does a great disservice to those who need our help the most. We all want to help resolve the hunger crisis in other nations, but only the legislation I will introduce soon will begin to deal with the real problems of world hunger.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would announce that each Member has 1 minute remaining, with the gentleman from Michigan having the right to close.

Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the balance of my time.

Mr. Speaker, one more time let me say that the gentleman from Ohio has made the case for this bill. This bill speaks to research partnerships, including developing-nation participation. There is nothing in this bill that requires any kind of deportation to these developing nations. It provides a way by which they can be part of research that will provide them foods that will probably help with immunizations, extra vitamins, but only after the research is done with the involvement of scientists from the developing countries.

Mr. Speaker, I would urge the passage of the bill. I think that the opponent has misunderstood the bill.

Mr. KUCINICH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the balance of my time.

Mr. Speaker, the fact is that the agriculture and biotechnology industries are driving the research; and as such, they have ignored a tremendous amount of work that has been done by independent scientists that challenges the rationale of the industry itself.

There are serious issues that need to be addressed, that relate to food security as a fundamental human right. The philosopher and human rights activist of India, Vandana Shiva, has said that globalization of agriculture is violating all components of food-related human rights. She says that everywhere across the world, less food is being produced and less diverse food is being grown and less is reaching the poor and hungry. She quotes Senator McGovern as stating: "Food security in private hands is no food security at all," because corporations are in the business of making money, not feeding people.

Vandana Shiva goes on to say, "The centralized and chemical-intensive production and distribution system, linked with the green revolution model, proved itself to be undemocratic, wasteful and non-sustainable. The imperative now is to shift to a democratic food system based on sustainable production, conservation and equitable access to resources and food security for all."

I would submit, Mr. Speaker, that in this bill, which authorizes certain research, if it is in any way connected, as this bill is, with the ag-biotech industry, there is no possibility that the human rights of people around the world are in any way going to be regarded.

Please defeat the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the balance of my time.

Mr. Speaker, the tremendous potential of plant genomics is limited only by the creativity of the scientists and this body and Washington allowing them to do the research. This bill will help create the next generation of plants that will provide consumer benefits, for example, plants that can be engineered to produce compounds, such as enzymes used for food processing; food that provides vaccines and antibodies; compounds used to produce biodegradable plastics; renewable energy production.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the chairman of the Committee on Science, the gentleman from New York (Mr. BOEHLERT), and the ranking majority member, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. HALL), for all of their support in bringing this bill to the floor; and of course, I wish to say a special thanks to the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON), the ranking member of our Subcommittee on Research, for all of her input and help. I think together we have crafted a good bill that will make good programs even better.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SMITH) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 2051, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the National Science Foundation to establish regional centers for the purpose of plant genome and gene expression research and development and international research partnerships for the advancement of plant biotechnology in the developing world.".

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LAHOOD). Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BARTON) and the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. MOORE) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BARTON).

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material on House Concurrent Resolution 387.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, first, I want to commend our distinguished chairman, the gentleman from New York (Mr. BOEHLERT), and our distinguished ranking member, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. HALL), for their excellent work on this resolution that was reported on a bipartisan basis from the Committee on Science. I also want to thank the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. MOORE), my good friend, for his excellent work and for serving as an original cosponsor with myself on this bill.

Before I get into my prepared remarks, I want to say a special "get well soon" to young Lindsay Taylor, who is 12 years old down in Round Rock, Texas. She is the President of her National Junior Honor Society. She is a budding civil engineer, although I think she wants to go to the University of Texas instead of Texas A&M, where I went to engineering school. She is home sick today and we need all of our young engineers to get well quick, so I hope that she does so very soon.

Our first great civil engineer in this country was the man that we now know as the Father of our country, George Washington. George Washington was a surveyor who made his living in between serving as a military commander in the militia, the British forces before the Revolutionary War, surveying and doing engineering work in what is now Virginia and going west, west from Virginia.

In 1852, we founded what is now called the American Society of Civil Engineers. If we had been alive at that point in time, the first great project that civil engineers would have worked on for this Nation would have been the Transcontinental Railroad. Can we imagine, if people came to the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. MOORE) and myself, or the gentleman from New York (Mr. BOEHLERT) and the gentleman from Texas (Mr. HALL) today and said, we want you to build a transcontinental railroad, could we do it? I doubt it. But the civil engineers of that time said, not a problem, and even as the Civil War was going on, they were racing to build what we now call the Transcontinental Railroad, and they hammered in the golden spike in 1869 and bound our great Nation together.

What would we have done if around the turn of the century, President Roosevelt, not Franklin Roosevelt, but Teddy Roosevelt had come and said, I want you to build the Panama Canal to bring together for the first time the Isthmus of Panama, the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. I do not think many of us could have worked on that project either successfully, but the civil engineers of that era did that. What about during World War II, if President Franklin Roosevelt had come and said, we need to build a great port infrastructure and we need to improve our highways and we need to build great pipelines, could we have done that? I do not think many of us could, but the civil engineers of that time could. What if in the 1950s President Eisenhower had come and said, Congressman Barton, I want you to build an interstate highway system. I do not think many of us could have done that, but the civil engineers of the 1950s did that.

I could go on and on. But as we begin to move into the 21st century, there are still great civil engineering projects to be done, and luckily for us today in the United States, we have over 125,000 members of the American Society for Civil Engineers, registered, professional engineers who have made it their life's work to build a better America.

We tend to think of engineers as kind of nerdy people with pencils behind their ears and slide rules in their pockets. Nothing could be further from the truth. They are people helping people. They are building the projects that bind this great Nation together and, more and more, binding this great world together.

So, Mr. Speaker, I am delighted, along with the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. MOORE), my good friend, to sponsor this resolution honoring the 150th anniversary of the American Society for Professional Engineers, because they have truly helped to build a better America.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I thank the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BARTON) for his good work on this bill. I also want to join my colleague from Texas in thanking the gentleman from New York (Mr. BOEHLERT), the chairman of the committee, and the gentleman from Texas (Mr. HALL), the ranking member.

I am very, very pleased to be here today with the gentleman from Texas to honor 150 years of service by the American Society of Civil Engineers to their profession, our country, and the world. ASCE is the oldest of engineering societies and clearly one of the best in the whole world.

Civil engineers literally have built America. One hundred and fifty years ago, there were no skyscrapers. There were wooden bridges and no one would have dreamed of spanning the Chesapeake Bay or the San Francisco Bay. Railroads were just beginning. Roads were at most two lanes and perhaps were even built of planks. Manned flights came over 50 years later.

Now, we have an interstate highway system, an intercontinental railroad system, and a network of local and international airports that are the backbone of United States commerce. Small dams have been replaced, Mr. Speaker, with huge ones that provide large volumes of electricity. Human health has been enhanced by improved sanitation with sanitary landfills, waste water treatment facilities, and distribution systems for clean water.

How much of this would have been possible without the American Society of Civil engineers? Well, we cannot know for sure, but they certainly deserve much of the credit. ASCE has encouraged generations of bright Americans to enter the profession. It has helped develop educational standards and continuing education opportunities for civil engineers, and it has established a series of institutes and a research foundation to advance the knowledge base of the profession.

ASCE is the largest publisher of civil engineering information in the world, much of which is at the fingertips of the ASCE membership through its Web site. The American Society of Civil Engineers has even gone international and has formal relationships with professional organizations of civil engineers in almost 50 countries.

The small group of engineers who banded together in 1852 would not recognize today's organization. ASCE now has around 125,000 members, over half of the civil engineers in this country, organized in sections, branches, and student chapters and clubs.

ASCE is not resting on its laurels, though. It is aggressively adding new services for its members. It has ambitious programs for working with the Congress, the government at all levels, and the public at large to place the programs and policies needed to improve our built environment. Priority areas for 2002 include clean water, infrastructure financing, math and science education, natural hazards impact reduction, and smart growth.

I ask my colleagues, Mr. Speaker, to join with me in approving House Concurrent Resolution 387 that congratulates and honors the American Society of Civil Engineers on 150 years of service. This is a spectacular beginning and I will bet we have not seen anything yet.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, let me say that several years ago the American Society for Civil Engineers made me one of their engineering fellows. It is a distinguished achievement award that they really give to engineers who have made a lifetime in civil engineering and have done outstanding feats. They gave it to me primarily because I am one of the few registered professional engineers in the Congress, but it is one of the high honors that I have received as a Member of the House, and the certificate is on my wall in the entry way to my office, and I am very, very proud of that.

For that and many, many reasons I think this is a resolution that is very worthwhile passing for this body because of the fine work that civil engineers have done for the last 150 years. So I hope that when the time comes to vote, we can pass it with unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker, I would simply say that this resolution we hope to pass by unanimous consent today and send to the other body and pass it over there so that it actually can be signed by the President and presented to the leadership of the American Society for Civil Engineers sometime this fall when the actual calendar anniversary occurs for the 150th anniversary. It is very, very worth doing, and I hope that we can do it in a very bipartisan fashion.

Mr. BOEHLERT. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for the opportunity to join my colleagues in commending the American Society of Civil Engineers (ASCE) for their 150 years of service to our country. I also want to thank the Gentleman from Texas, Mr. BARTON, and the Gentleman from Kansas, Mr. MOORE, for introducing this resolution.

It is difficult to imagine an area of our lives that has not been touched by civil engineers. They ensure that when we turn on the tap, we have clean water to drink. Civil engineers designed the massive transportation systems that make it possible for us to move freely and efficiently across this vast country. Moreover, civil engineers design technologies and practices to help clean up polluted water and to ensure that our natural resources are preserved for future generations.

Americans benefit from the expertise and hard work of engineers everyday, but rarely acknowledge or recognize our debt to them. I am lucky enough, however, to have a different experience with engineers. During my time on the Science Committee and especially as Chairman, I have come to rely on ASCE as a valuable resource. I may not be making headlines here, but we in government do not know everything all the time.

After the tragedy of September 11, we immediately began to look for lessons we could learn from this horrible event. FEMA put together a team, led by ASCE, to investigate the World Trade Center collapse. The team set out to discover exactly why the buildings collapsed, if the buildings could have stood for longer, and if more lives could have been saved. I cannot even begin to fathom the work this team did, but in eight months they delivered an important report to Congress detailing the sequence of events that led to the buildings' collapse. This work will go a long way toward saving lives. Now, we are working closely with ASCE with legislation that will hopefully make their jobs, on further building investigations, easier.

Mr. Speaker, I am very proud of the work that civil engineers do for our country and I am ever grateful for the service that ASCE provides to this Congress and to me personally. I congratulate ASCE on 150 years and I look forward to many more.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BARTON) that the House suspend the rules and agree to the concurrent resolution, H. Con. Res. 387.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

HIGHWAY FUNDING RESTORATION ACT

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 3694) to provide for highway infrastructure investment at the guaranteed funding level contained in the Transportation Equity Act for the 21st Century, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 3694

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Highway Funding Restoration Act".

SEC. 2. FEDERAL-AID HIGHWAY PROGRAM OBLIGATION CEILING.

Section 1102 of the Transportation Equity Act for the 21st Century (23 U.S.C. 104 note; 112 Stat. 115, 113 Stat. 1753) is amended by adding at the end the following:

"(k) RESTORATION OF OBLIGATION LIMITATION FOR FISCAL YEAR 2003.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, for fiscal year 2003, the obligations for Federal-aid highway and highway safety construction programs that are subject to the obligation limitation set forth in subsection (a)(6)—

"(1) shall be not less than $27,746,000,000; and

"(2) shall be distributed in accordance with this section.".

SEC. 3. RESTORATION OF OBLIGATION CEILING.

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the adjustment made pursuant to section 1102(h) of the Transportation Equity Act for the 21st Century for fiscal year 2003 shall be deemed to be zero.

SEC. 4. ADJUSTMENTS TO GUARANTEE FUNDING LEVELS.

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, all adjustments made pursuant to section 251(b)(1)(B) of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985 to the highway category and to section 8103(a)(5) of the Transportation Equity Act for the 21st Century for fiscal year 2003 shall be deemed to be zero. This section shall apply immediately to all reports issued pursuant to section 254 of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985 for fiscal year 2003, including the discretionary sequestration preview report.

SEC. 5. SENSE OF CONGRESS REGARDING REVENUE ALIGNED BUDGET AUTHORITY.

It is the sense of Congress that the revenue aligned budget authority provision in section 251(b)(1)(B) of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985 should be amended in the future to more accurately align highway spending with highway revenues while maintaining predictability and stability in highway funding levels.

SEC. 6. AUTHORIZATION FOR HIGHWAY PROJECTS.

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, projects and activities designated on pages 82 through 92 of House Report 107–308 shall be eligible for fiscal year 2002 funds made available for the program for which each project or activity is so designated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from Alaska (Mr. YOUNG) and the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alaska (Mr. YOUNG).

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3694, the Highway Funding Restoration Act. This bipartisan bill has 316 cosponsors in the House of Representatives and the other body companion measure, S. 1917, is cosponsored by 74 Members of that body.

I want to particularly thank the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. NUSSLE), the chairman of the Committee on the Budget, for his support for the restoration of highway funding. The gentleman from Iowa (Mr. NUSSLE) included in the House budget resolution a provision for the outlay of these funds. I support enforcement of the budget resolution adopted by the House.

Mr. Speaker, I am working with the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. NUSSLE) to address in the future a better method of calculating the Revenue Aligned Budget Authority, which we refer to as RABA. We need to more accurately align highway spending with highway revenues, while maintaining predictability and stability in highway funding levels.

There is a clear and strong consensus that H.R. 3694 is the right approach to restore proposed cuts to Federal-aid highway funding in the fiscal year 2003 budget.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 3694 restores not less than $4.4 billion to the Federal-aid highway construction programs for fiscal year 2003, and ensures that these funds will be spent according to the formula established by the Transportation Equity Act for the 21st Century, otherwise called TEA-21.

I am pleased that the leadership of the House has agreed to this expedited process. I am confident that the Senate will also take timely action on the bill before the fiscal year 2003 appropriations cycle is well underway.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is vitally necessary for three reasons. First, State Departments of Transportation cannot absorb the proposed cut of $8.5 billion below the level of funding received in the fiscal year of 2002, a 27 percent program reduction.

Second, transportation spending keeps people employed. More than 180,000 family-wage jobs are associated with the $4.4 billion funding restoration in this bill.

Third, cash balances in the Highway Trust Fund, the dedicated revenue source for highway and transit construction, are sufficient to accommodate this funding restoration.

Again, I want to thank the full committee ranking member, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR); the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. PETRI), the chairman of the Subcommittee on Highways and Transit; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BORSKI), the subcommittee ranking member, along with the full membership of the Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure, and all of the other 242 Members of the House urging immediate passage of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, again, I cannot stress enough the importance of this bill. It does restore the funding level where it should be to build our highways so that we can keep the 180,000 people employed and, more than that, increase the infrastructure necessities in this country and keep them on the right track.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

□ 1545

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BORSKI), the ranking member of the Subcommittee on Highways and Transit.

Mr. BORSKI. Mr. Speaker, let me first thank the distinguished ranking member of the full committee, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR), for his hard work in this measure. I also want to commend our chairman, the gentleman from Alaska (Mr. YOUNG), and our subcommittee chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. PETRI), for this excellent piece of legislation; and I rise in strong support of H.R. 3694, the Highway Funding Restoration Act.

Mr. Speaker, one of the most important measures this House has passed in recent times was TEA 21, and in TEA 21 we were able to increase the amount of spending for our highways by over 40 percent and for transit by over 46 percent. We did that because, A, we worked together. This is the best committee in the whole House in my view for working in a bipartisan manner for the good of this country. We did that by capturing all the gasoline taxes that were sent out by the people of this country to Washington to use for transportation for its intended purpose. We had firewalls erected to protect that spending, and we came up with the revenue aligned budget authority, better known as RABA.

This process is important to make sure and to ensure that all incoming gas tax receipts are applied to transportation infrastructure spending, a core principle that members of the Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure strongly support. Based on RABA calculations for the fiscal year 2003, the President's fiscal year 2003 budget proposes to cut funding for the Federal aid highway program by $8.6 billion or 27 percent. A cut of this magnitude would be absolutely devastating to State and local transportation programs.

The administration claims that TEA 21 required these cuts; and, Mr. Speaker, that simply is not true. TEA 21's guaranteed highway investment level as reflected in the President's budget is a floor, not a ceiling. The administration could have and should have requested more.

The committee bill proposes to increase fiscal year 2003 funding by at least $4.4 billion to $27.7 billion, the level authorized in TEA 21. This bill accomplishes the following: it protects 180,000 family wage construction jobs; promotes economic recovery through the proven infusion of funds and of proven infrastructure programs; and helps compensate for the drastic and disruptive swing in highway funding in fiscal year 2003. Moreover, the additional funds are completely paid for with funds already in the highway trust funds. The fund has an $18 to $20 billion balance that can easily accommodate this and can only be used for highway and transit programs.

In addition, and as important to providing increased funding for fiscal year 2003, the bill provides a higher budget baseline for which to measure next year's reauthorization bill. A higher baseline will improve our ability to increase highway spending in the bill reauthorizing TEA 21.

Mr. Speaker, the committee bill has strong bipartisan support in the House with 317 members co-sponsoring the introduced bill. I urge my colleagues to vote for this bill.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. PETRI), the chairman of the Subcommittee on Highways and Transit of the Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure.

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the bill before us, H.R. 3694, the Highway Funding Restoration Act. It is a bipartisan bill as we have heard, and I look forward to its passage this afternoon.

We are moving this bill today as part of an agreement with the leadership in the Committee on Appropriations to ensure proper levels of highway spending under the budget firewalls in the coming year.

The supplemental appropriations bill that will soon be considered by the House will also include language addressing the guaranteed levels of spending as agreed to by the two committees. By declaring the revenue aligned budget authority, which is in the committee known as RABA, calculation for budget year 2003 to be zero, H.R. 3694 restores not less than $4.4 billion for the Federal aid highway program. This is consistent with funding levels that were contemplated when TEA 21 was passed back in 1998, and it ensures that the funding will be spent according to the rules set forth in the Transportation Equity Act for the 21st century, TEA 21.

With 317 co-sponsors in the House and 74 of the companion bill in the Senate, H.R. 3694 has strong bipartisan support. The administration's 2003 budget proposal cut funding for the highway program by 27 percent. State highway programs cannot absorb a cut of this significance, nor can the economy of our country. The potential employment loss created by a cut of this magnitude could be as high as 180,000 family-wage jobs. As the economy climbs out of this short recession, the loss of this many jobs is unacceptable. And it is important to note that the highway trust fund with a cash balance of $20 billion can sustain this spending.

The trust fund is comprised of dedicated revenues paid by highway users that can only be used for highway and transit projects.

Finally, as part of the agreement between the two committees, we have agreed to include technical changes requested by the Committee on Appropriations regarding project funding. Certain projects from the budget year 2002 Transportation Appropriations Act have been found by the Department of Transportation to be ineligible for funding under Federal aid highway guidelines.

As Members may know, I was one who was very concerned by the actions of the Committee on Appropriations last year and trusts that we will not see a repeat this year. But in the spirit of the agreement and securing the additional needed funds, a provision making those projects eligible is included here today.

Mr. Speaker, restoring the highway funds under the firewall is supported by our Nation's governors, our mayors, industry and labor interests alike. I join with our chairman, the gentleman from Alaska (Mr. YOUNG), full committee ranking member, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR), the Subcommittee on Highways and Transit committee ranking member, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BORSKI), and the more than 300 cosponsors and supporting H.R. 3694, and I urge its immediate passage.

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentlewoman from the District of Columbia (Ms. NORTON).

Ms. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished ranking Member for yielding me time. I thank the gentleman and the gentleman from Alaska (Mr. YOUNG), as well as our subcommittee chair and ranking members, for working so well and so closely together to bring this bill to the floor today.

One thing we have enough money for in this time of war-time priorities, this time of recession is to continue to build our roads and bridges. Thank goodness for the trust fund. Have trust in the trust fund. It would be absurd to let the technicality of a flawed formula keep us from doing what we always do in times of recession: we build and we make jobs.

We are told, of course, that we are coming out of a recession. Well, I want someone to tell that to the 8.6 million Americans who are jobless. I want you to look at our unemployment rates: February, 5.5 percent; March, 5.7 percent; April, 6 percent. Surely Congress can do more with rising unemployment than make it worse.

We have heard about stimulus all last year. This is the stimulus bill. That is what this bill is, and it would destimulate the economy if we were to pull it. Remember, we are not restoring what we had hoped to achieve, but only what we guaranteed to achieve.

Mr. Speaker, I include in the RECORD the job loss by State if there were an $8.6 billion cut in the Highway trust fund, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, I indicate that we are not putting the whole thing back. It is 4.4 billion because that is all they had a right to expect. They did not have the right to expect that we would exceed it. They had a right to expect what we guaranteed them when we passed TEA-21. But if we did what the administration wanted, it would be a grand total of 360,961 jobs lost. Nobody wants to do that in this Congress.

Interrupting highway construction would have a particularly chaotic effect on States which are having to cut every other program. They now have to cannibalize some highway projects in order to finish others. It would exacerbate the budget cutting already going on in every State of the Union; and, worse, it would reduce the baseline next year when we reauthorize the surface transportation bill. In other words, we would hurt the past because we are trying to catch up. We would hurt the present and we would hurt the future.

We are getting somewhere in infrastructure. I can remember just a few years ago we were sliding back so badly that we wondered if we would ever catch up. We are catching up. This is no time to turn around and go down the road to deeper unemployment and to infrastructure damage. Thanks for all involved to help us keep moving ahead.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to address one thing that has been brought up by the previous speakers. I do believe this is, in fact, a stimulus package. It is not as large as we would like to have it. There has also been mention, though, about the President's budget cut, and I will have to say that is true; but I also say I have been under seven Presidents since I have been in this body, probably one more than my good friend, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR).

Under our Constitution the President, regardless of what party, has the responsibility to submit a budget. And as I tell every constituent that comes into our office, that is his responsibility. But it is our responsibility as a House of the people to write the budget. We write the budget. We raise the money for it from the people, and we designate how it shall be spent. That is our role. I am extremely pleased that 317 Members of this Congress decided in this case that it was more important to, in fact, restore the guaranteed money for the construction of highways and bridges and improving our highway system than we were to take the recommendation of another branch of this great government of ours. But I never hold it against any one of the Presidents for that responsibility of submitting the budget.

It makes us do our work a little bit more efficiently and a little bit better. As I mentioned in my opening statement, a whole lot of other people, including the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. NUSSLE), has recognized the importance of the construction of a highway system within this great Nation of ours. We have just begun. We have rail to improve. We have, again, air to improve. We have shipping ports to improve. And the responsibility of the committee, which is totally bipartisan, the responsibility of that committee is to make sure that the people of America recognize the importance of a modern transportation system being put in place for the future. And I would just like to say this is one tiny infant step in the right direction.

We must continue that as we reauthorize TEA–21, as we go forth with new rail legislation, as we go forth with other legislation packages and that we will do.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 15 seconds to say I concur with my distinguished chairman.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentlewoman from California (Mrs. TAUSCHER).

Mrs. TAUSCHER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the ranking member for yielding me time.

Mr. Speaker, I too rise to support H.R. 3694 and to thank the chairman and the full committee ranking member and the subcommittee chairman and ranking member for their leadership to put forward the Highway Funding Restoration Act.

I am proud to be a co-sponsor of this legislation and am proud of the bipartisan way the Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure has worked together to bring this bill to the floor.

This bill will restore $373 million for highway projects in California and allow projects we desperately need to move forward, including adding carpool lanes to I–680/80, widening Highway 4, and developing the Oakland Airport interconnector.

This does not replace all the money President Bush cut from California's transportation budget, but it is a good first step. It also translates to saving more than 15,000 good-paying jobs across our State. Commuters in the Bay Area face some of the worst congestion in the country, and we are also facing a sluggish economy.

Now is not the time to be cutting Federal funding for highway projects. This bill will fund California's section of the highway account at $2.3 billion for the next year. While this amount was authorized in TEA–21 for the next year, it is not sufficient to meet California's needs. I will continue to push for more money to be used from the trust fund which has $18 billion in cash just sitting in it.

In addition to restoring money, this bill reasserts the integrity of the budget firewalls in TEA–21 and the realigned budget authority mechanism called RABA. These provisions will ensure that local communities can plan transportation projects knowing that the Federal Government will be a predictable partner throughout the life of a project.

Every community in America depends on transportation to keep its people and local economy moving. I urge my colleagues to support this bill and keep America's transportation improvements on track.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, in anticipation of yielding to the next gentleman, I will yield to the gentleman from West Virginia (Mr. RAHALL), but I just wanted to point out that the gentleman was the ranking member on the Subcommittee on Highways and Transit in the last Congress when we authorized TEA–21. I want to acknowledge the superb role the gentleman played in the crafting of that legislation and the many hours of personal endeavor he gave to the crafting of what became known as TEA–21, and his solid grasp of the issues that we fought over in this body and in the conference.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia (Mr. RAHALL).

□ 1600

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) and our ranking member on the full Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure for yielding me the time and for his very kind words. I also join in commending the gentleman from Alaska (Mr. YOUNG), the chairman, for his leadership; the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR), ranking member; the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BORSKI), the ranking subcommittee member; and the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. PETRI), the ranking subcommittee chairman, for their leadership, not only in bringing this legislation to the floor but for last year's invaluable leadership, the last time we did TEA–21, for their leadership in that regard as well.

Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that H.R. 3694, the Highway Funding Restoration Act, does have broad bipartisan support. It will restore, as we have heard, at least $4.4 billion to the Federal aid to highway program from the amount the administration had requested. These brutal cuts would have sucked the life out of our highway program in southern West Virginia.

Keeping our new highway construction and existing road improvements on track is our number one need at this moment. This vital work saves lives and brings new jobs, especially in the southern part of West Virginia, as we are once again experiencing the devastating effects of floods that have ravaged through our area in the last couple of weeks.

We have $18 billion sitting in the Highway Trust Fund. If anything, we need to pour more of it into building the roads our people desperately need, not less. Today, we will set a funding level of $21.7 billion for fiscal year 2003. This will help to ensure that each of the 50 States gets the highway funding they need so they will not have to resort to postponing or canceling highway projects.

In West Virginia, we are working on many highway projects to enable our citizens to participate in interstate commerce and to open up West Virginia to new business opportunities, including the Coalfields Expressway, the King Coal Highway and upgrading the safety of Route 10.

The West Virginia DOT cannot afford to lose Federal funds necessary to plan, build and maintain these roads. I know the DOTs in the other 49 States will say the same thing about their highway projects. That is why we have such broad support for this legislation, not only from Members of Congress, but from State governments, highway groups and others around the country.

When we wrote TEA–21, we guaranteed a minimum level of spending in the Federal aid to highway program. H.R. 3694 will ensure that the budgetary firewalls are protected. In addition, this bill restores the obligation limits for fiscal year 2003 so Federal highway spending will not be less than $27.7 billion.

In West Virginia, we have been working to build jobs through transportation. We also have a strong transportation research center at the Rahall Appalachian Transportation Institute at Marshall University in Huntington, West Virginia, which is one of the University Transportation Centers we established in TEA–21.

The bill we will pass today will restore $4.4 billion to the Federal aid highway program. It will protect 180,000 family wage construction jobs. In West Virginia, we will see $45.9 million restored and 3,074 jobs protected.

We have 317 bipartisan cosponsors of this legislation because of the tremendous leadership of Chairman YOUNG and Ranking Member OBERSTAR and because each Member realizes how vital a guaranteed highway funding level is to their respective States in order to secure constituents' jobs in the highway construction industry and to promote a healthy economy.

Again, I ask for enactment of this legislation and commend the leadership on both sides of the House.

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes.

The role of a chairman, Mr. Speaker, is to lead and our chairman of the Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure on this legislation and on many others has led. As soon as we got word of the budget language and the prospective cut, without waiting to see the actual document, the chairman sprang into action. We joined forces, as we do on this committee and as we are known almost legendarily in the House, on a bipartisan basis, to rectify the wrong.

The chairman was quite right in pointing out that, I choose to say, with all the Presidents with whom we have served, not under. We are a coequal branch. This is not new. Cutting highway funds started with President Lyndon Johnson in 1968 on the recommendation of the same gang that did one, the then Bureau of the Budget, that said we need to cut funds in order to dampen inflation, build up a bit of a surplus to offset the burgeoning surplus at the beginning of the Vietnam War, and as the chairman observed, it is an old dictum that the President proposes but the Congress disposes.

As astute and an early observer as Edmund Burke, the noted British historian, political science writer, a century ago observed that a presidential budget in the hands of a strong Speaker is worth little more than the paper on which the words are written. Well, we intend to do what Burke observed, to assure that those are just simply numbers on paper and that the intent of TEA–21 is carried out.

It will restore $4.4 billion of the President's 27 percent cut in the Federal aid highway program. Important for a number of reasons, as other speakers have noted, this cut itself will, or this restoration will affect 180,000 jobs, but the original budget cut proposed would affect 360,000 jobs over the next 5 years. Worse, it will result in a budget surplus in the Highway Trust Fund of $34 billion and extend it out over a decade. It will reach a nearly $80 billion surplus in the Highway Trust Fund.

By way of comparison when we started with TEA–21 in January of 1998, there was a $29 billion surplus in the Highway Trust Fund. We would be going backward. In fact, if we do not make this restoration the last year of funding for TEA–21 will be less than the first year of TEA–21. That is not the direction in which the American people want this country to move or expect this committee to move in.

We do not establish a ceiling for the highway program. The bill says highway funding should be at least $27.7 billion. That is the minimum, and as the process goes forward, I hope we will be able to restore even more than that as we get into the final process of the budget and the supplemental appropriations bill with the other body.

The Highway Trust Fund now can support $30 billion in outlays. By the end of this process, I hope we will have achieved an outcome that expends every last penny of that Highway Trust Fund. We did not just do this as an accident when we crafted TEA–21. That was a hard fought bill here on this floor till 2:30 in the morning on the budget process in 1997, and then all the way through the committee and into 1998, and we had an overwhelming vote, and then we went to conference and we had a 2-month conference with the United States Senate. Every piece of that legislation was fought through.

The other body did not want to have a guaranteed account. The other body did not want to have the levels of authorization that we set forth in what became TEA–21, and this committee, standing for this body, fought for the guaranteed account and for the revenue adjusted budget authority, and we got it in there. We cannot let a presidential or OMB dictum take it away from us and from the people of this country.

The extraordinary history of TEA–21 has been that in the 42 years of the interstate highway program we invested $114 billion of Federal funds to build the 44,000-mile interstate highway system. In 4½ years of TEA–21, we invested $114 billion. We did in 4½ years what it took 42 years of the interstate highway program, and in the process we created 1½ million new jobs, the good jobs, the jobs that buy the homes and buy the cars and buy the household appliances and put the kids through school, jobs that have sustained the economic expansion of the last 7 years, until it hit the body with that recession that we are trying to creep out of.

The Highway Trust Fund is a dedicated account. It cannot be used for any other purpose. It can only be used for highway and transit funding. It can support more funding, and when we crafted TEA–21, we knew that the year-by-year levels that we authorized would be less than what could be spent. So we provided an additional $15 billion of authorizations over and above the amount specified year by year.

There is enough in the Highway Trust Fund now. There is a surplus of roughly $20 billion, and let us acknowledge that maybe 6 or $7 billion of that is already spoken for by forward funding of the States, but there is enough in there to support the level of funding that we authorized for this coming fiscal year for TEA–21, and we ought to do it. We ought to do it because, if for no other reason, the cost of congestion, the congestion tax in just 68 major metropolitan areas of the United States was $78 billion last year as verified by the Texas Transportation Institute in its report on congestion.

This is a bargain, $8.6 billion restored or $4.4 billion that we are trying to do in this bill. That is a bargain to help buy down the cost of congestion.

A key element of this bill is a sense of Congress that we will work together in a reauthorization to ensure that the revenue alignment mechanism of RABA is fine-tuned to more accurately align highway fund spending with highway revenues so as to have greater predictability and stability in highway funding.

I understand also that our Chairman, the gentleman from Alaska, has reached an agreement with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to attach the language of this bill to the supplemental appropriations bill instead of language that would have declared that the RABA mechanism shall have no force or effect. Now that is very serious language that would have had a very, very bad effect, and I think striking that language and supplanting our bill is a good agreement.

That agreement also has a dark side, and the dark side is that we also have to agree to authorize projects that were earmarked in the Transportation Appropriations Act this fiscal year that are ineligible for funding. I do not want to debate the merits of those particular projects, but I just want to focus on process.

This is an example of legislative process that is spinning out of control. In the last several years we have moved away from deliberative consideration of legislation, including transportation appropriations bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LAHOOD). The time of the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) has expired. The gentleman from Alaska (Mr. YOUNG) has 12 minutes remaining.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR).

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Alaska (Mr. YOUNG) for his generosity.

Two-thirds of the Members of this body did not serve in this body in prior years when there were different rules that now are routinely waived. We had transportation appropriations conference reports submitted to us at 7 a.m. on the day the bill is to be considered 2 hours later, no time for the staff of the majority or the minority to evaluate what is in those bills. Members were lucky if they saw a copy, let alone have an idea of what was in it.

Similarly, the other body no longer passes appropriation bills with numbered amendments, so that when they come over here from conference there is no opportunity to stand up and challenge a particular numbered amendment in an appropriation bill.

In 1993, Chairman Natcher of the Committee on Appropriations brought the transportation appropriation conference report with 63 amendments in disagreement. We could challenge each one of those. We no longer can do that.

☐ 1615

We no longer even have the time to consider in appropriate fashion what has been sent from the other body, whether in a conference report or otherwise.

Now we ought to know before we vote what we are voting on. We should know that bills that earmark interstate highway funds for projects that are not on the interstate are pending before us; we ought to know that the bill before us commits public lands funds for projects that do not involve Federal lands; that scenic byway funds are for a project that is not on a scenic byway; that bridge replacement funds are dedicated to a project that does not replace a bridge.

We are in the position in this committee of voting without having an opportunity to know what we are voting on and, therefore, to object to what we are voting on. We need to restore the deliberative process to this body's consideration of appropriation bills.

I know that I speak for myself, I know I speak for the Members on the Democratic side, and I know that I express the frustration that the chairman and members of our committee on the majority side have as well. Let us restore a deliberative process so that we can do the public's business in a fair and effective way.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished chairman for yielding this time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the statements of my good friend, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR), are absolutely true. I am hoping we can convince the leadership on this side of the aisle, and, of course, the leadership on that side of the aisle, that what is sent to us from the other body in the waning hours of any session has been done inappropriately and that we have to have the time to make sure we are actually following the proper procedure and that we do not rush to leave this body and leave, very frankly, some things done inappropriately, as were done last year in October, because we do have to rectify that now.

I have let it be known to Members that went back to their districts and made statements of what they had achieved, and they had not achieved that, that I understand their dilemma. So this is a one-shot deal for them, and I hope everybody watching this in their office who are on that list makes sure they understand this is the only time they are going to get a chance to get projects agreed to, as it goes through our committee, or at least in consultation with the chairman and myself, and of course the ranking member. Because that is the appropriate way to do it.

The other body, the only way we can control that body is to reject what they send to us, and that takes a great deal of courage. I am hoping we have the courage to say no, not until we take the time to do what is right legislatively, with a great deal of deliberation, and the ability to do the job that we have been elected to do. This has been going on now for about 4 or 5 years, and I think it is time the House stands up and says no, this is not going to happen, you are not going to send us a great big bill, bigger than that room itself, and not know what is in it.

My staff and myself have spent time, primarily my staff, and I will admit that, just researching what was done last year to find out what projects were put in that were not authorized and, very frankly, took monies from projects that were authorized; and we do not think that is the correct way to go.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from Maryland (Mrs. MORELLA).

Mrs. MORELLA. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for not only yielding me this time, but for his leadership on this issue, and I also commend the ranking member, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR).

I just simply rise in support of this bill, H.R. 3694, because this bill, the Highway Funding Restoration Act, is going to restore no less than $66.5 million in highway funding in my State of Maryland, and that is going to represent 2,725 jobs. So I urge passage of the bill.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I insert for the RECORD an exchange of letters between the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. NUSSLE), Chairman of the Committee on the Budget, which I referred to earlier.

U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE,
Washington, DC, May 2, 2002.

Hon. JIM NUSSLE,
Chairman, Committee on Budget, Cannon Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Thank you for your letter of May 2, 2002, regarding H.R. 3694, the Highway Funding Restoration Act and for your willingness to waive consideration of provisions in the bill that fall within your Committee's jurisdiction under House Rules.

I agree that your waiving consideration of relevant provisions of H.R. 3694 does not waive your Committee's jurisdiction over the bill. I also acknowledge your right to seek conferees on any provisions that are under your Committee's jurisdiction during any House-Senate conference on H.R. 3694 or similar legislation, and will support your request for conferees on such provisions.

As you request, your letter and this response will be included in the committee report on the legislation as well the Congressional Record during consideration on the House Floor.

Thank you for your cooperation in moving this important legislation.

Sincerely,

DON YOUNG,
Chairman.

U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET,
Washington, DC, May 2, 2002.

Hon. DON YOUNG,
Chairman, Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure, Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. YOUNG: On May 1, 2002 the Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure ordered reported H.R. 3694, the Highway Funding Restoration Act. At introduction, H.R. 3694 was referred solely to the Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure. In committee, however, an amendment was adopted that added three new sections to the bill. Section four, "Adjustments to Guarantee Funding Levels," and section five "Sense of Congress Regarding Revenue Aligned Budget Authority" are within the primary jurisdiction of the Budget committee. I want to thank you for working closely with me to ensure that those provisions were acceptable to the Budget Committee.

Because of our close working relationship on this matter and in order to expedite the consideration of H.R. 3694, I do not intend to seek a sequential referral of the bill as ordered reported. In not seeking a sequential referral of H.R. 3694, the committee does not waive its jurisdiction or its prerogatives over this legislation. The Budget Committee also reserves its authority to seek conferees on

H.R. 3694 or a similar Senate bill with respect to provisions that are within the committee's jurisdiction; and, I ask your commitment to support any such request by the Budget Committee.

Finally, I would ask that you include a copy of our exchange of letters on this matter in your committee report and in the Congressional Record during floor consideration. Thank you for your assistance and cooperation in this matter.

Sincerely,

JIM NUSSLE,
Chairman.

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to state my enthusiastic support of H.R. 3694, the Highway Funding Restoration Act.

First of all, I would like to salute the Chairman of the full Committee, the gentleman from Alaska (Mr. YOUNG), and the Chairman of the Subcommittee on Highways & Transit, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. Petri). Just as importantly, the leadership abilities of the ranking member of the full Committee, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR), and the ranking member of the Subcommittee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BORSKI), were important components in this entire process.

I have been a member of the Transportation and Infrastructure Committee since my first term, and things are no different now than in 1983. Smart investments in our nation's infrastructure brings about national economic benefits. It's estimated that every dollar invested in our highway system yields $2.60 in economic benefits.

As many of my colleagues in this body may know, the Administration's FY 2003 budget request would have reduced Federal-Aid highway funding to $23 billion down, which represents a dramatic decrease from FY 2002 funding levels.

Many of my colleagues were rightfully concerned at this funding request, and I shared those concerns. While $23 billion may sound like a lot of money and more than sufficient, the reality is much different. The real funding needs for our infrastructure already exceed current funding levels by billions and billions. Needless to say, the proposed decrease would have caused potential transportation funding problems in every state and in every congressional district.

For my home state of Illinois, under the proposed budget, we would have seen a decrease of $236 million in highway funds in FY 2003, and there would have been serious ramifications across Illinois. Highway and road projects across Illinois would have been adversely impacted. Just as importantly, it could have also meant the loss of 10,000 jobs—jobs that we can ill afford to lose.

By restoring the highway funds to the levels authorized under TEA–21, Illinois would have nearly $139 million restored, and by funding our transportation needs in a fiscally responsible fashion, we all win.

I'm proud to be an original cosponsor of H.R. 3694. With nearly 320 cosponsors, it's clear to see that there is broad, bipartisan support for this bill. I urge all of my colleagues to vote for this important piece of legislation.

Mr. UDALL of New Mexico, Mr. Speaker, I rise today in strong support of H.R. 3694, the Highway Funding Restoration Act. This important legislation restores critical funding for the Federal-Aid Highway Program.

Upon enactment of TEA–21 in 1998, funding for the Federal-aid highway program was linked to highway user fee revenues deposited into the Highway Trust Fund. This was done partially by including a budgetary mechanism included in TEA–21 called Revenue Aligned Budget Authority (RABA), which adjusts the guaranteed amount of highway funding available to reflect the most recent estimates of Highway Trust Fund revenues.

An unexpected downturn in highway revenues caused by the RABA provision of TEA–21 resulted in a decrease of an $8.6 billion or 27 percent cut in highway funding in the President's FY 2003 budget proposal.

H.R. 3694 restores billions of critical dollars for our state departments of transportation as they cannot be expected to absorb a cut of this magnitude in one year, especially at a time when State revenues are also declining. The 27 percent cut in highway funds proposed in the president's Budget will decimate State transportation programs, delay efforts to decrease road congestion and deny the traveling public all of the benefits that would result from reduced congestion—shortened travel times, increased productivity and economic growth, and improved safety.

This shortfall will have a severe negative impact on New Mexico and will result in a decrease of $69 million for the New Mexico State Highway and Transportation Department. For many in the Intermountain West, it is not unheard of for people to commute 70 miles to and from work. As a result, the transportation on our roadways is absolutely crucial. A loss of $69 million will cause the postponement of several important highway construction projects, as well as reductions in money spent on road maintenance. In addition, it is projected that New Mexico will lose an estimated 2,700 jobs as a result of the shortfall.

I am sure many other states will face similar funding and job losses if these monies are not restored for FY 03. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to join me in support of H.R. 3694 and avoid a devastating shortfall in state transportation budgets.

Mr. MATHESON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to give my full support to the passage of H.R. 3694, this is vital legislation, needed not just for our roads, bridges, and interchanges but also for our towns, our states, and our national economy.

There is no doubt that our economy is not expanding as it was just a couple of years ago. Unemployment is at a six year high and consumer confidence is low. There is a way, however, to provide good jobs, expand commerce, and make lasting investments in our country and that is to restore highway funding.

This year's budget has an $8.6 billion cut to federal-aid highways. The swings in our economy have translated into a wild swing in how we administer highway funding. Just last year, the Treasury Department predicted a $4.5 billion increase in funding levels, only to be faced with a $4.4 billion drop. We must now carefully choose our funding priorities.

Without the restoration of this money we will only exacerbate the economic downturn. In my home state of Utah, where highway funding is at a premium, these cuts mean a $55 million dollar shortfall in roadway funds. This means the loss of jobs and contracts-over 3,000 jobs in Utah alone and 180,000 jobs across the country.

Finally, we have already collected the taxes for the trust fund—it was paid by every person who filled a gas tank, rode a bus, or drove a car last year.

Mr. Speaker, this is a short-term fix. While the idea of Revenue Aligned Budget Authority has worked well in the past, it is clear that we need to adjust the formula to prevent future cuts from happening.

This is a uniquely bi-partisan and bicamerae bill that will immediately help all of our constituents and ensure that we continue to make good sound investments and create good, well paying jobs.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, this Member rises in strong support of H.R. 3694, the Highway Funding Restoration Act.

This Member would like to begin by commending the distinguished gentleman from Alaska (Mr. YOUNG), the Chairman of the Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, and the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR), the ranking Member of the Committee, for their hard work in bringing this bill to the Floor. With 317 cosponsors, it is clear that the vast majority of House Members recognize the importance of H.R. 3694.

Mr. Speaker, Americans who pay the gas tax at the pump expect those dollars to be used for roads and other transportation expenses, and they expect that the money will be made available promptly. Any budget decision to spend less on road construction and maintenance would be a bad fiscal decision as we attempt to move from an economic recession. It would be a serious mistake to cut infrastructure spending at this critical time.

The bill would restore a minimum of $4.4 billion for highway programs in the budget. This would bring highway funding back to the level anticipated when the Transportation Equity Act for the 21st Century (TEA–21) was enacted. For the State of Nebraska, this legislation would result in the restoration of $32 million.

The Highway Trust Fund contains a surplus of about $20 billion—money already paid in gas taxes. Motorists deserve to have these funds used expeditiously for transportation purposes, rather than to accumulate huge trust fund surpluses.

Mr. Speaker, as an original cosponsor of this bill, this Member urges his colleagues to support H.R. 3694.

Mr. BALDACCI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in strong support of H.R. 3694, the Highway Funding Restoration Act. This bill restores $4.4 billion in transportation funding and brings us back to the TEA–21 floor of $27.7 billion. It also ensures that this funding will be used to repair decrepit roads and bridges by placing it behind TEA–21's firewalls.

Every state in America will be affected by the $8.8 billion reduction in highway funding proposed by President Bush. While the RABA formula was responsible for the large upswing in FY2002 and the large downturn in FY2003, we must continue to tie gas tax receipts to Trust Fund expenditures to ensure that surpluses are not kept artificially high for budgetary gimmicks.

The President and this Congress have the authority to restore this critical funding, and I am pleased that we are here today to take the first step. H.R. 3694 sets a funding floor of $27.7 billion, a $4.4 billion improvement over President Bush's budget proposal. However, I believe that we can and must do better.

I understand that the Senate is considering doing somewhat better and restoring $5.7 billion. Such an increase can be sustained by the Trust Fund given the current $20 billion surplus and projected receipts. I urge the House to work with the other body to achieve at least that amount.

The $8.8 billion reduction contained in the President's budget request would result in a $37 million decrease in funding for my state. H.R. 3694 restores about $22 million leaving a $15 million difference. Maine's transportation needs are significant, and the backlog of roads and bridges in need of repair continually grows. Harsh winter weather and extensive use by both tourists and heavy trucks take their toll on our roads.

Currently, Maine needs to repair 4,000 miles of its estimated 8,300 highway miles. In its biennial budget, only 200 of these miles can be repaired. At this rate Maine will finish its arterial highways in 8 years, and major collectors in 34 years. That pace is obviously insufficient to maintain the safe and reliable transportation network that is crucial to my state's economic future.

Closing the remaining $15 million deficit would allow the repair of approximately 30 additional miles. While this number may seem small, 30 miles can be critical in providing safe access to rural Maine communities.

Mr. Speaker, I also strongly support Section 6 of this bill which specifically authorizes 49 projects which encountered eligibility problems. Three of these projects are located in Maine. It is absolutely critical that this funding go forward to assist the communities of Brewer, Portland and Aroostook County.

I want to reiterate that the funding level we are setting here today is a floor, not a ceiling. I am supporting this legislation as a first step in ensuring that the infrastructure needs of our communities in Maine and throughout the country can be met. I hope that we will work to go beyond this floor and restore the remaining funding that our states need and deserve.

Mr. TOM DAVIS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 3694, the Highway Funding Restoration Act, critical legislation introduced by my friend and colleague, Mr. YOUNG.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, under TEA–21, funding for the federal-aid highway program was linked to highway user fee revenues deposited into the Highway Trust Fund (HTF). This was achieved in part by a budgetary mechanism called RABA, the Revenue Aligned Budget Authority, which adjusts the guaranteed amount of highway funding available to reflect the most recent estimates of HTF revenues. Due to an unexpected downturn in highway revenues (attributable to a decline in gas, tire, and truck sales, and the overall economic recession), the President's FY 2003 budget proposed an $8.6 billion, or 27 percent cut in highway funding. H.R. 3694 restores $4.4 billion to the highway program (a return to TEA–21's FY 2003 levels), and preserves TEA–21 "firewalls," ensuring that the additional money will be spent on highway projects.
